AUTHOR'S NOTE

As its title indicates, this volume of the Biography continues to deal with the Chivalrous attitude toward human existence. It takes up, after some yet further traffic with Alianora of Provence, the line of those English monarchs who, rumor said, were the inheritors of Dom Manuel's life; and its concern is, in particular, with the women committed to the forlorn experiment of matrimony with these Manuelides. Yet, since this volume has already a formal preface, under the heading Precautional, here seems to be very small need for any further prologizing, as to the intended scope of this "Chivalry."

Of these tales The Story of the Fox-Brush was the earliest written, in, it appears, November 1904. The Story of the Sestina was completed during the following December; whereafter "Chivalry" was put aside for an intended full-length romance dealing with a yet earlier English queen. Toward the end of 1905, however, the manuscript of that not ever completed comedy concerning Isabella of Angoulême and her second husband, Hugh de Lusignan, was burned by its unapproving author, and I returned to this "Chivalry." The Story of the Housewife was then written, in the January of 1906, although I find the note from which this story eventually developed thus recorded very early in 1904:

"Remember to write the story of John Copeland, out of Froissart; making the whole affair turn on a jesting offer of Edward III to give him in exchange for the King of Scots a certain woman's hand in marriage. Philippa would have a personal interest in representing David as her captive, — to shake the Countess of Salisbury's influence?"

After this note, by the by, with rather staggering inconsequence, follows a suggestion of the title and general atmosphere of "Gallantry." The young author, in that far-off spring of 1904, then immediately continued in friendly exhortation of himself to write,

"Also, a mediæval dizain modeled roughly on Massucio in his Novellino, — try a comic one and a supernatural one. (Roger of Wendover ought to furnish a suggestion for the latter.) Whole affair purporting to be from the Contes of an imaginary Frenchman (Englishman?) of the early sixteenth century; and called 'Chivalry.'"

— Both of which extracts go to prove that every writer does not always follow out his original intentions to a hair's breadth. The remainder of "Chivalry," in any case, was written in 1906–7, — in the same unordered fashion, — until the lateliest done of these tales, The Story of the Scabbard, was finished early in the spring of 1907.

The stories appeared in Harper's Monthly Magazine at irregular intervals between August 1905 and April 1907, the more thanks to the then lately perfected method of reproducing paintings in full color. For they were stories which the then famous artist Howard Pyle, at that time under an annual contract with Harper & Brothers, could more or less illustrate with brightly tinted pictures, which during the opening years of this century were so generally admired that nobody had any especial need to bother over the faults and defects of the accompanying text, except, to be sure, the artist, upon whom was foisted the necessity of — again, I fear, it must be added, more or less, — reading these tales before he illustrated them.

In any case, I have yet furthermore to add, it was this same necessity which in the end proved fatal to my quasi-connection with Harper's Monthly Magazine. I touch now upon a matter necessarily so lethal to any author's self-esteem that my sense of honesty proves hardly a sufficing spur to urge the approach. Yet the unconcealable fact remains that Howard Pyle, after some five years of continually illustrating my stories, felt that he could not afford to go on wasting the maturity of his genius upon impermanent writings. He had, not ungracefully, put up with the ungrateful labor of making pictures which the more imaginative might regard as illustrating "The Line of Love," and yet again the flare of his color-work had fitfully illumined the unexplored, impenetrable depths of "Gallantry." But "Chivalry," it must here be confessed, proved, in that striking phrase familiar to all really erudite persons, the last straw. So, after finishing the two illustrations which were to accompany The Story of the Scabbard, Howard Pyle sought relief from our joint paymasters, and explained to them, in the April of 1907: "I am now at the height of my powers. . . . I do not think it is right for me to spend so great a part of my time in manufacturing drawings for magazine stories which I cannot regard as having any really solid or permanent literary value. Mr. Cabell's stories . . . are neither exactly true to history nor exactly fanciful, and whilst I have made the very best illustrations for them which I am capable of making, I feel that they are not true to mediæval life, and that they lack a really permanent value such as I should now endeavor to present to the world."

His scruples were honored. Howard Pyle was soothed by being commissioned to illustrate a higher class of fiction, such as the short stories of Marjorie Bowen and Basil King and Bryan Hooker and Thomas V. Briggs and Mr. Pyle's own short stories: and H. M. Alden, at that time the editor of Harper's Monthly Magazine, began to find, seriatim and with all civility, the other tales now included in "The Certain Hour" — of which one had, regrettably, already been accepted, — not sufficiently up to my earlier standards to make them available.

I record all this, in, as it were, the teeth of my own self-esteem, because I am conscious to-day that I owe a great deal to Howard Pyle. After some six years of contributing a short story every month or so to the august and everywhere well-thought-of pages of Harper's Monthly Magazine, I was unavoidably in train to become an "established" magazine writer, when this preservatory protest of Howard Pyle's, against illustrating any more of my fiction, caused me — metaphorically, at least, — to be bundled neck and crop down the long spiral stairs of the old Harper & Brothers' offices in Franklin Square. And I really can discover, after looking over the roster of the American Institute of Arts and Letters, no "established" magazine contributor of twenty years ago who came to any honorable æsthetic ending.

The quiet but never-sleeping terror of human nature and anatomy, and of almost all biological facts, was far too great for any writer to resist. I look back, now, with flat disbelief, upon the kind of "editing" which was then in vogue. . . . I recall how the first story which I submitted to Harper's Monthly Magazine was found acceptable except for its solecism of accrediting Sir John Falstaff with the possession of a belly. I do not mean that the authority of

Shakespeare was upon this point disputed, or that any explicit slenderness was demanded as a matter of good form: it was merely that in the pages of a magazine "with a circulation so general as ours" the utmost which could decently be, and ultimately was, allowed to Falstaff was a paunch. . . . I recall how the second piece of fiction I submitted to the same periodical — Adhelmar at Puysange, — was rejected because its deplorable heroine was at that time a married woman. By allowing a married woman to kiss, not merely once, but upon three occasions, a man who was not her husband, I was indulging, it was gently conveyed to me — even at that early date, — in carnal fancies which, from every reputable standpoint, were obscene and lewd and lascivious and indecent. It was admitted that in the fourteenth century, the period of this story, a kiss amounted to rather less if anything than a handshake: but that was not the point. The point which disposed of this and of every other question of mediæval etiquette was the point that Harper's Monthly Magazine was read by all members of the family. So I was advised to, and eventually did, preserve the moral tone appropriate for "a magazine with a circulation so general as ours" by making Jurgen's granddaughter, Mélite de Puysange, merely betrothed at the time of her three reprehensible osculations. . . .

I recall how the "availability" of story after story was found to pivot upon one or another just such niggling and fantastic requirement, always in order to avoid shocking the morbid moral sensibility which was editorially assumed in the subscription list of Harper's Monthly Magazine to rage pandemically. And I recall, too, that after a while I began now and then to submit a story which was not found anywhere unsuited for reading aloud when a family of subscribers were gathered cosily under the gas-jet, before the Latrobe stove. I was learning, without knowing it, just what regrettable veracities had to be gingerly skirted or ignored or lied about in the liveries of "a magazine with a circulation so general as ours." And I suspect that, in an additional year or two, I would have been honoring all these insane taboos, just as a matter of good taste, with entire self-approval. But, as it happened, in the very last nick of occasion, Howard Pyle requested that for the future he be given some other author to illustrate; and he thus deprived me of my six-year-old market, but he decisively preserved me from becoming an esteemed contributor to the best-thought-of American magazines of the Rooseveltian era.

MEANWHILE, of the stories now in your hand, six needed, against their primal appearance in electrotype, very careful tinkering with, because they dealt with the relations between a married woman and a male person whom no ecclesiastic had licensed to enter her bedroom. The Story of the Scabbard, wherein Gyllem's intentions were unmistakably extra-legal, had to be made presentable, not by any feather-brained author, but by the judicious pen of an editor, before a theme so unsavory could perhaps be touched upon in Harper's Monthly Magazine: and The Story of the Choices also required a particularly thorough disinfecting, I remember, since in its first form Queen Ysabeau was unfaithful to her marriage vows with a candor then inadmissible into any fiction not printed as news of the day in the morning paper.

THESE stories, then, were collected in volume form, and first published in the autumn of 1909, as an illustrated Christmas book, which — for reasons not ever wholly clear to me, — was vended in a red cardboard box upon the lid of which a cavalier of the English Restoration was attempting, with a depravity only too characteristic of that licentious era, to hold the hand of a young woman. Several dozen copies were sold.

"Chivalry" was later reissued, in the unillustrated Kalki edition, in 1922: and I then took occasion to recast these tales into something rather nearer my original conception of them: so that hereinafter you have these stories very much as they were first written. I venture to hope that, even so, their lewd enormities will mount no crimson banners in the cheek of innocence and will sound reasonably few alarums to the pulses of the constitutionally lascivious. And I venture, too, to add that I at least detect, in one and all of the stories which are attributed to this Nicolas de Caen, some planned attempt to follow out, alike in the method of narration and in the point of view, his notions rather than — necessarily — what were the notions of his American transcriber even so far back as in 1904.

PRECAUTIONAL

IMPRIMIS, as concerns the authenticity of these tales perhaps the less debate may be the higher wisdom, if only because this Nicolas de Caen, by common report, was never a Gradgrindian. And when writing this volume in particular (as Nicolas is supposed to have done), in 1470, as a dependent on the Duke of Burgundy, it were but human nature should old Nicolas, in dealing with the putative descendants of Dom Manuel and Alianora of Provence, be somewhat niggardly in the ascription of praiseworthy traits to any member of the house of Lancaster or of Valois. Rather, must one, in common reason, accept this Nicolas de Caen as confessedly a partisan writer, who upon occasion will recolor an event with such nuances as will be least inconvenient to a Yorkist and Burgundian bias.

Item, the reteller of these stories needs in addition to plead guilty of having abridged the tales with a free hand, and of having omitted entirely the overprolix beginnings of two of these narratives, — namely, in " The Story of the Sestina " and in " The Story of the Choices."

Item, these tales have been a trifle pulled about, most notably in "The Story of the Satraps," where it seemed advantageous, on reflection, to put into Gloucester's mouth a history which in the original version was related ab ovo, and as a sort of bungling prologue to the story proper.

Item, the reteller of these stories desires hereby to tender appropriate acknowledgment to Mr. R. E. Townsend for his assistance in making an English version of the lyrics included hereinafter; and to avoid discussion as to how freely, in these lyrics, Nicolas has plagiarized from Raimbaut de Vaqueiras and other elder poets.[1]

And — "sixth and lastly," — should confession be made that in the present rendering a purely arbitrary title has been assigned this little book; chiefly for commercial reasons, since the word "dizain" has been adjudged both untranslatable and, in its pristine form, repellently outré.

You are to give my titular makeshift, then, a wide interpretation; and are always to remember that in the bleak and florid age which these tales commemorate this Chivalry was much the rarelier significant of any personal trait than of a world-wide code in consonance with which all estimable people lived and died. Its root was the assumption (uncontested

[1] For this perplexing matter the curious may consult Paul Verville's Notice sur la vie de Nicolas de Caen, p. 93 et seq. The indebtedness to Antoine Riczi is, of course, conceded by Nicolas in "The Epilogue."

then) that a gentleman will always serve his God, his honor and his lady without any reservation; nor did the many emanating by-laws ever deal with special cases as concerns this triple, fixed, and fundamental homage.

Such is the trinity served hereinafter. Now, about lady-service, or domnei, I have written elsewhere. Elsewhere also I find it recorded that "the corner-stone of Chivalry is the idea of vicarship: for the chivalrous person is, in his own eyes at least, the child of God, and goes about this world as his Father's representative in an alien country."

I believe the definition holds: it certainly tends to explain the otherwise puzzling pertinacity with which the characters in these tales talk with conviction about God, and act upon assured knowledge as to His intentions and preferences. These people are the members of one family engrossed, as most of us are apt to be when in the society of our kin, by family matters and traditions and bywords. It is not merely that they are all large children consciously dependent in everything upon a not foolishly indulgent Father, Who keeps an interested eye upon the least of their doings, and Who punishes at need. It is not only that they believe themselves to act under surveillance and to speak within earshot of a divine eavesdropper. The point is, rather, that they esteem this observation to be as tender, and the punishment to be as unwilling, as that which they themselves extend to their own children's pranks and misdemeanors. The point is that to them Heaven is a city as real and tangible as we consider Havre or Hackensack or Hamburg, and that all their living is a conscious journeying toward this actual place. The point is that the Father is a real father, and not a word spelt with capital letters in the Church Service; not an abstraction, not an hypothesis, not even a sort of a something vaguely describable as "the Life Force," — but, instead, a very famous kinsman, of whom one is justifiably proud, and whom one is on the way to visit. . . . The point, in brief, is that His honor and yours are inextricably blended, and are both implicated in your behavior on your journey.

We nowadays can just cloudily imagine this viewing of life as a sort of boarding-school from which one eventually goes home, with an official report as to progress and deportment: and in retaliation for being debarred from the comforts of this view, the psychoanalysts have no doubt invented for it some opprobrious explanation. At all events, this Chivalry was a pragmatic hypothesis: it "worked," and it served society for a long while, not faultlessly of course, but by creating — like all the other codes of human conduct which men have ever tried, — a tragi-comic mêlée wherein contended "courtesy and humanity, friendliness, hardihood, love and friendship, and murder, hate, and virtue, and sin."

For the rest, since good wine needs no bush, and an inferior beverage is not likely to be bettered by arboreal adornment, I elect to piece out my exordium (howsoever lamely) with "The Printer's Preface."

"Here begins the volume called and entitled the Dizain of Queens, composed and extracted from divers chronicles and other sources of information, by that extremely venerable person and worshipful man, Messire Nicolas de Caen, priest and chaplain to the right noble, glorious and mighty prince in his time, PHILIPPE, Duke of Burgundy, of Brabant, etc., in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord God a thousand four hundred and seventy: and imprinted by me, Colard Mansion, at Bruges, in the year of our said Lord God a thousand four hundred and seventy-one; at the commandment of the right high, mighty and virtuous Princess, my redoubted Lady, ISABELLA OF PORTUGAL, by the grace of GOD Duchess of Burgundry and Lotharingia, of Brabant and Limbourg, of Luxembourg, and of Gueldres, Countess of Flanders, of Artois, and of Burgundy, Palatine of Hainault, of Holland, of Zealand and of Namur, Marquesse of the Holy Empire, and Lady of Frisia, of Salins and of Mechlin; whom I beseech ALMIGHTY GOD long to continue in her virtuous disposition in this world, and after our poor fleet existence to receive eternally. AMEN."

THE PROLOGUE

"Afin que les entreprises honorables et les nobles aventures et faicts s'armes soyent noblement enregistrés et conservés, je vais traiter et raconter et inventer ung galimatias."

The Dizain of Queens of that noble maker in the French tongue, Messire Nicolas de Caen, dedicated to the most illustrious Isabella of Portugal, of the House of the Indomitable Alphonso Henriques, and Duchess Dowager of Burgundy. Here begins in auspicious wise the Prologue.

THE PROLOGUE

À Sa Dame

INASMUCH as it was by your command, illustrious and exalted lady, that I have gathered together these stories to form the present little book, you should the less readily suppose I have presumed to dedicate to your Serenity this trivial offering because of my esteeming it to be worthy of your acceptance. The truth is otherwise. Your postulant approaches, not spurred toward you by vainglory, but rather by equity, and equity's plain need to acknowledge that he who seeks to write of noble ladies must necessarily implore at outset the patronage of her who is the light and mainstay of our age. I bring my book to you as Phidyle approached another and less sacred shrine, farre pio et saliente mica, and I lay before you this my valueless mean tribute, not as appropriate to you, but as the best I have to offer.

It is a little book wherein I treat of divers queens and of their love-business; and with necessitated candor I concede my chosen field to have been harvested, and scrupulously gleaned, by many writers of innumerable conditions. Since Dares Phrygius wrote of Queen Heleine, and Virgil (that shrewd necroman-cer) of Queen Dido, a preponderating mass of clerks, in casting about for high and serious matter, have chosen, as though it were by common instinct, to dilate upon the amours of royal women. Even in romance we scribblers must contrive it so that the fair Nicolete shall be discovered in the end to be no less than the King's daughter of Carthage, and that Sir Doön of Mayence shall never sink in his love-affairs beneath the degree of a Saracen princess; and we are backed in this old procedure, not only by the authority of Aristotle, but, oddly enough, by that of reason.

Kings have their policies and wars wherewith to drug each human appetite. Their consorts are denied these makeshifts. Yet love remains, as the pivot of each normal woman's life, and, in consequence, as the arbiter of that ensuing life which is eternal. It is this pivot and this arbiter because — as anciently Propertius demanded, though not, to speak the truth, of any woman, —

Quo fugis? ah demens! nulla est fuga, tu licet usque
Ad Tanaim fugias, usque sequetur amor.

And a dairymaid, let us say, may love whom she will, and nobody else be a penny the worse for her mistaking of the preferable nail whereon to hang her affections; whereas with a queen this choice is more portentous. She plays the game of life upon a loftier table, ruthlessly illuminated; she stakes by her least movement a tall pile of counters, some of which are, of necessity, the lives and fortunes of many persons whom she knows not, unless it be by vague report. Grandeur sells itself at this hard price, and at no other. A queen must always play, in fine, as the vicar of destiny, free to choose but very certainly compelled, in the ensuing action, to justify that choice: as is strikingly manifested by the authentic histories of Brunhalt, and of Guenevere, and of swart Cleopatra, and of several others who were born to the barbaric queenhoods of extinct and dusty times.

All royal persons are (I take it) the immediate and the responsible stewards of Heaven; and since the nature of each man is like a troubled stream, now muddied and now clear, their prayer must ever be, Defenda me, Dios, de me! Yes, of exalted people, and even of their near associates, life, because it aims more high than the aforementioned Aristotle, demands upon occasion a more great catharsis, which would purge any human audience of unmanliness, through pity and through terror, because, by a quaint paradox, the players have been purged of human restraint. For a moment Destiny has thrust her scepter into the hands of a mortal being, and Chance has exalted a mortal being to decide the issue of many mortal lives. These two — with what immortal chucklings one may facilely imagine, — have left the weakling thus enthroned, free to direct the heavy outcome, free to choose, and free to evoke much happiness or age-long weeping, but with no intermediate course unbarred. Now prove thyself! saith Destiny. And Chance appends: Now prove thyself to be at bottom a god or else a beast, and now eternally abide that choice! Meanwhile we may not tell thee clearly by which choice thou mayst prove either.

In this little book about the women who intermarried, not very enviably, with an unhuman race (a race predestinate to the red ending which I have chronicled elsewhere, in The Red Cuckold), it is of ten such moments that I treat.

You alone, I think, of all persons living, have learned, as you have settled by so many instances, to rise above mortality in such a testing, and unfailingly to merit by your conduct the plaudits and the adoration of our otherwise dissentient world. You have very often spoken in the stead of Destiny, with nations to abide your verdict; and in so doing have both graced and hallowed your high vicarship. If I forbear to speak of this at greater length, it is because I dare not couple your well-known perfection with any imperfect encomium. Upon no plea, however, can anyone forbear to acknowledge that he who seeks to write of noble ladies must necessarily implore at outset the patronage of her who is the light and mainstay of our age.

Therefore to you, madame, — most excellent and noble lady, to whom I love to owe both loyalty and love, — I dedicate this little book.

I

THE STORY OF THE SESTINA

"Armatz de fust e de fer e d'acier,
Mos ostal seran bosc, fregz, e semdier,
E mas cansos sestinas e descortz,
E mantenrai los frevols contra 'ls fortz."

The First Novel. — Alianora of Provence, coming in disguise and in adversity to a certain clerk, is by him conducted across a hostile country; and in that troubled journey are made manifest to each the snares which had beguiled them aforetime.

The Story of the Sestina

IN this place we have to do with the opening tale of the Dizain of Queens. I abridge, as afterward, at discretion; and an initial account of the Barons' War, among other superfluities, I amputate as more remarkable for veracity than interest. The result, we will agree at outset, is that to the Norman cleric appertains whatever these tales may have of merit, whereas what you find distasteful in them you must impute to my delinquencies in skill rather than in volition.

Within the half-hour after Avenel de Giars' death (here one overtakes Nicolas mid-course in narrative) Dame Alianora thus stood alone in the corridor of an unfamiliar house. Beyond the arras the steward and his master were at irritable converse.

"If the woman be hungry," spoke a high and peevish voice, "feed her! If she needs money, give it to her, within reason! But do you not be annoying me at an hour which is out of all reason!"

"This woman demands to see the master of the house," the steward then retorted.

"Incredible Bœotian, inform her that the master of the house has no time to waste upon vagabonds who select the middle of the night as a suiting hour to pop out of nowhere. Why did you not do so in the beginning, you dolt? "

The speaker got for answer only a deferential cough, and very shortly continued: " This is remarkably vexatious. Vox et præterea nihil, — which signifies, Yeck, that to converse with women is always delightful. Admit her! "

This was done; and Dame Alianora came into an apartment littered with papers, where a neat and shriveled gentleman of fifty-odd sat at a desk and scowled.

He presently said, " You may go, Yeck." He had risen, the magisterial attitude with which he had awaited her entrance cast aside. " Oh, God! " he said; " you, madame! "

His thin hands, scholarly hands, were plucking at the air.

Dame Alianora had paused, greatly astonished, and there was an interval before she said, " I do not recognize you, messire."

" And yet, madame, I recall very clearly that some thirty years ago the King-Count Raymond Bérenger, then reigning in Provence, had about his court four daughters, each one of whom was afterward wedded to a king. First, Meregrett, the eldest, now regnant in France; then Alianora, the second and most beautiful of these daughters, whom troubadours hymned as the Unattainable Princess. She was married a long while ago, madame, to the King of England, Lord Henry, third of that name to reign in these islands."

Dame Alianora's eyes were narrowing. "There is something in your voice," she said, "which I recall."

He answered: "Madame and Queen, it is a voice which sang not unfrequently in your Provence when both of us were younger. I concede with the Roman that I have somewhat deteriorated since the reign of Cynara. Yet have you quite forgotten the Englishman who made so many songs of you? They called him Osmund Heleigh."

"He made that Sestina of Spring which won the violet crown at my betrothal," the Queen said; and then, with eagerness, "Messire, can it be you are Osmund Heleigh?"

He shrugged assent. She looked at him for a long time, rather sadly, and demanded if he were the King's man or of the Barons' party.

The nervous hands were raised in deprecation. "I have no politics," Messire Heleigh began. He stated afterward, gallantly enough, "I am the Queen's man, madame."

"Then aid me, Osmund," she said.

He answered with a gravity which singularly became him, "You have reason to understand that to my fullest power I will aid you."

"You know that at Lewes these swine overcame us." He nodded assent. "Now they hold the King, my husband, captive at Kenilworth. I am content that he remain there, for he is of all the King's enemies the most dangerous. But, at Wallingford, Leicester has imprisoned my son, Prince Edward. The Prince must be freed, my Osmund. Warren de Basingbourne commands what is left of the royal army, now entrenched at Bristol, and it is he who must liberate my son. Get me to Bristol, then! Afterward we will take Wallingford."

The Queen issued these orders in cheery, practical fashion, and did not admit opposition into the account, for she was a capable woman.

"But you, madame?" he stammered. "You came alone?"

"I come from France, where I have been entreating — and vainly entreating, — succor from yet another monkish king, the holy Lewis of that realm. Eh, what is God about when He enthrones these whining pieties! Were I a king, were I even a man, I would drive these smug English out of their foggy isle in three days' space! I would leave alive not one of these curs that dare yelp at me! I would —" She paused, anger veering into amusement. "See how I enrage myself when I think of what your people have made me suffer," the Queen said, and shrugged her shoulders. "In effect, I skulked back in disguise to this detestable island, accompanied by Avenel de Giars and Hubert Fitz-Herveis. To-night some half-dozen fellows — robbers, thorough knaves, like all you English, — attacked us on the common yonder and slew the men of our party. While they were cutting Avenel's throat I slipped away in the dark and tumbled through many ditches till I spied your light. There you have my story. Now get me an escort to Bristol! "

Messire Heleigh did not reply instantly. Then he said:

" This Avenel de Giars and this Fitz-Herveis, — they gave their lives for yours, as I understand it, — pro caris amicis. And yet you do not grieve for them."

" I shall regret Avenel," the Queen acknowledged, " for he made excellent songs. But Fitz-Herveis? — foh! the man had a face like a horse." Again her mood changed. " Many persons have died for me, my friend. At first I wept for them, but now I am dry of tears."

He shook his head. " Cato very wisely says, 'If thou hast need of help, ask it of thy friends.' But the sweet friend that I remember was a clean-eyed girl, joyous and exceedingly beautiful. Now you appear to me one of those ladies of remoter times, — Faustina, or Jael, or Artemis, the King's wife of Tauris, — they that slew men, laughing. I am somewhat afraid of you, madame."

She was angry at first; then her face softened. " You English! " she said, only half mirthful. " Eh, my God! you remember me when I was a high-hearted young sorceress. Now the powers of the Apsarasas have departed from me, and time has thrust that Alianora, who was once the Unattainable Princess, chin-deep in misery. Yet even now I am your Queen, messire, and it is not yours to pass judgment upon me."

"I do not judge you," he returned. "Rather I cry with him of old, Omnia incerta ratione! and I cry with Salomon that he who meddles with the strife of another man is like to him that takes a hound by the ears. Yet do you listen, madame and Queen! I cannot afford you an escort to Bristol. This house, of which I am in temporary charge, is Longaville, my brother's manor. Lord Brudenel, as you doubtless know, is of the Barons' party and — scant cause for grief! — is with Leicester at this moment. I can trust none of my brother's people, for I believe them to be of much the same opinion as those Londoners who not long ago stoned you and would have sunk your barge in Thames River. Oh, let us not blink the fact that you are not over-beloved in England! So an escort is out of the question. Yet I, madame, if you so elect, will see you safe to Bristol."

"You? singly?" the Queen demanded.

"My plan is this: Singing folk alone travel whither they will. We will go as jongleurs, then. I can yet manage a song to the viol, I dare affirm. And you must pass as my wife."

The plan seemed unreasonable, and Dame Alianora waved it aside. Any such touch-and-go masquerading was out of the question! But reflection suggested nothing better; it was impossible to remain at Longaville, and the man spoke sober truth when he declared any escort other than himself to be unprocurable. Besides, the lunar madness of the scheme was its strength; that the Queen would venture to cross half England unprotected — for Osmund Heleigh, on the face of him, was a pasteboard buckler, — was an event which Leicester would neither anticipate nor on report credit. There you were! these English had no imagination.

The Queen snapped her fingers and said: "Very willingly will I be your wife, my Osmund. But how do I know that I can trust you? Leicester would give a great deal for me; he would gladly pay any price for the pious joy of burning the Sorceress of Provence. And you are not wealthy, I suspect."

"You may trust me, mon bel esper," — his eyes here were those of a grieved child, — "because my memory is better than your memory." Messire Osmund Heleigh gathered his papers into a neat pile. "This room is mine. To-night I keep guard in the corridor, madame. We will start at dawn."

When he had gone, Dame Alianora laughed contentedly. "Mon bel esper! my fairest hope! The man called me that in his verses, — thirty years ago! Yes, I may trust you, my poor Osmund."

So they set out at cockcrow. He had procured for himself a viol and a long falchion, and had somewhere got suitable clothes for the Queen; and in their aging but decent garb the two approached near enough to the appearance of what they desired to be thought. In the courtyard a knot of servants gaped, nudged one another, but openly said nothing. Messire Heleigh, as they interpreted it, was brazening out an affair of gallantry before the countryside; and they esteemed his casual observation that they would find a couple of dead men on the common exceedingly diverting.

When the Queen asked him, on that morning, "And what will you sing, my Osmund? Shall we begin the practice of our new profession with the Sestina of Spring?"—then old Osmund Heleigh grunted out: "I have forgotten that rubbish long ago. Omnis amans, amens, saith the satirist of Rome town, and with reason."

Thus they passed Frome, keeping to the northwest of this town, and meeting nobody.

One sees them thus, trudging the brown, naked plains under a sky of steel. In a pageant the woman, full-veined and comely, her russet gown girded up like a harvester's might not inaptly have prefigured October; and for less comfortable November you could nowhere have found a symbol more precise than was her lank companion, humorously peevish under his white thatch of hair, and constantly fretted by the sword tapping at his ankles.

They made Hurlburt prosperously and found it vacant, for the news of Falmouth's advance had driven the villagers hillward. There was in this place a child, a naked boy some two years old, lying on a doorstep, overlooked in his elders' gross terror. As the Queen, with a sob, lifted this boy the child died.

"Starved!" said Osmund Heleigh; "and within a stone's-throw of my snug home!"

The Queen laid down the tiny corpse, and, stooping, lightly caressed its sparse flaxen hair. She answered nothing, though her lips moved.

Past Vachel, scene of a recent skirmish, with many dead in the gutters, they were overtaken by Falmouth himself, and stood at the roadside to afford his troop passage. The Marquess, as he went by, flung the Queen a coin, with a jest sufficiently high-flavored. She knew the man her inveterate enemy, knew that on recognition he would have killed her as he would a wolf. She smiled at him and dropped a curtsey.

"This is remarkable," Messire Heleigh observed. "I was hideously afraid, and am yet shaking. But you, madame, laughed."

The Queen replied: "I laughed because I know that some day I shall have Lord Falmouth's head. It will be very sweet to see it roll in the dust, my Osmund."

Messire Heleigh somewhat dryly observed that tastes differed.

At Jessop Minor befell a more threatening adventure. Seeking food at the Cat and Hautbois in that village, they blundered upon the same troop at dinner in the square about the inn. Falmouth and his lieutenants were somewhere inside the house. The men greeted the supposed purveyors of amusement with a shout; and one of these soldiers — a swarthy rascal with his head tied in a napkin, — demanded that the jongleurs grace their meal with a song.

Osmund tried to put him off with a tale of a broken viol.

"Haro!" the trooper blustered; "by blood and by nails! you will sing more sweetly with a broken viol than with a broken head. I would have you understand, you hedge-thief, that we gentlemen of the sword are not partial to wordy argument."

Messire Heleigh fluttered inefficient hands as the men-at-arms gathered about them, scenting some genial piece of cruelty.

"Oh, you rabbit!" the trooper jeered, and caught at Osmund's throat, shaking him.

In the act this rascal tore open Messire Heleigh's tunic, disclosing a thin chain about his neck and a handsome locket, which the trooper wrested from its fastening. "Ahoi!" the marauder continued. "Ahoi, my comrades, what sort of minstrel is this, who goes about England all hung with gold like a Cathedral Virgin! He and his sweetheart" — the actual word was more gross, — "will be none the worse for an interview with our Marquess."

The situation smacked of awkwardness, because

Lord Falmouth was familiar with the Queen, and to be brought specifically to his attention meant death for two detected masqueraders. Hastily Osmund Heleigh said:

"Messire, the locket contains the portrait of a lady whom in my youth I loved very greatly. Save to me, it is valueless. I pray you, do not rob me of it!"

But the trooper shook his head with drunken solemnity. "I do not like the looks of this. Yet I will sell it to you, as the saying is, for a song."

"It shall be the king of songs," said Osmund, — "the song that Arnaut Daniel first made. I will sing for you a Sestina, messieurs, — a Sestina in salutation of Spring."

"I would prefer something about women, and about that spring at which a soldier refreshes himself without any salutation," replied the drunken trooper. "However, a bargain is a bargain."

Then sang Messire Heleigh:

"Awaken! for the servitors of Spring
Proclaim his triumph! ah, make haste to see
With what tempestuous pageantry they bring
The victor homeward! haste, for this is he
That cast out Winter, and all woes that cling
To Winter's garments, and bade April be!

"And now that Spring is master, let us be Content, and laugh, as anciently in spring

The battle-wearied Tristan laughed, when he Was come again Tintagel-ward, to bring Glad news of Arthur's victory, — and see Ysoude, with parted lips, that waver and cling.

"Not yet in Brittany must Tristan cling
To this or that sad memory, and be Alone, as she in Cornwall; for in spring
Love sows against far harvestings, — and he Is blind, and scatters baleful seed that bring Such fruitage as blind Love lacks eyes to see!"

Osmund paused here for an appreciable interval, staring at the Queen. You saw his flabby throat aquiver, his eyes melting, saw his cheeks kindle, and youth seeping into the lean man like water over a crumbling dam. His voice was now big and desirous.

Sang Messire Heleigh:

"Love sows, but lovers reap: and ye will see
The loved eyes lighten, feel the loved lips cling,
Never again when in the grave ye be
Incurious of your happiness in spring,
And get no grace of Love there, whither he
That bartered life for love no love may bring.

"No braggart Heracles avails to bring Alcestis hence; nor here may Roland see
The eyes of Aude; nor here the wakening spring
Vex any man with memories: for there be

No memories that cling as cerements cling,
No force that baffles Death, more strong than he.

"Us hath he noted, and for us hath he
An hour appointed; and that hour will bring Oblivion. — Then, laugh! Laugh, dear, and see
The tyrant mocked, while yet our bosoms cling,
While yet our lips obey us, and we be Untrammeled in our little hour of spring!

"Thus in the spring we jeer at Death, though he Will see our children perish and will bring Asunder all that cling while love may be."

Then Osmund put the viol aside and sat quite silent. The soldiery judged, and with cordial frankness stated, that the difficulty of his rhyming scheme did not atone for his deficiencies in the indecent, but when the Queen of England went among them with Messire Heleigh's faded green hat she found them liberal. The fellow with the broken head repeated, between a pair of very solemn hiccoughs, that a bargain was a bargain, and he returned the locket with the addition of a coin. So, for the present, these two went safe, and quitted the Cat and Hautbois fed and unmolested.

"My Osmund," Dame Alianora said, by and by, "your memory is better than I had thought."

"I remembered a boy and a girl," he returned. "And I grieved that they were dead."

Afterward they plodded on toward Bowater, and the ensuing night they rested in Chantrell Wood. They had the good fortune to encounter dry and windless weather and a sufficiency of brushwood, with which Osmund constructed an agreeable fire. In its glow these two sat, eating bread and cheese.

But talk languished at the outset. The Queen had complained of an ague, and Messire Heleigh was sedately suggesting three spiders hung about the neck as an infallible corrective for this ailment, when Dame Alianora rose to her feet.

"Eh, my God!" she said; "I am wearied of such ungracious aid! Not an inch of the way but you have been thinking of your filthy books and longing to be back at them! No; I except the moments when you were frightened into forgetfulness, — first by Falmouth, then by the trooper. O Eternal Father! afraid of a single dirty soldier!"

"Indeed, I was very much afraid," said Messire Heleigh, with perfect simplicity; — "timidus perire, madame."

"You have not even the grace to be ashamed! Yet I am ashamed, messire, that Osmund Heleigh should have become the book-muddled pedant you are. For I loved young Osmund Heleigh."

He also had risen in the firelight, and now its convulsive shadows marred two dogged faces. "I think it best not to recall that boy and girl who are so long dead. And, frankly, madame and Queen, the merit of the business I have in hand is questionable. It is you who have set all England by the ears, and I am guiding you toward opportunities for further mischief. I must serve you. But do you well understand, madame, that ancient folly in Provence yonder has nothing to do with the affair! Count Manuel left you: and between his evasion and your marriage you were pleased to amuse yourself with me — "

" You were more civil then, my Osmund — "

" I am not uncivil, I merely point out that this old folly constitutes no overwhelming obligation, either way. I cry nihil ad Andromachen! For the rest, I must serve you, I repeat, because you are a woman and helpless; yet I cannot forget that he who spares the wolf is the sheep's murderer. It would be better for all England if you were dead. Hey, your gorgeous follies, madame! Silver peacocks set with sapphires! Cloth of fine gold — "

" Would you have me go unclothed? " Dame Alianora demanded, pettishly.

" I say to you no such thing. I say to you, with Tertullian, ' Let women paint their eyes with the tints of chastity, insert into their ears the Word of God, tie the yoke of Christ about their necks, and adorn their whole person with the silk of sanctity and the damask of devotion.' I say to you that the boy you wish to rescue from Wallingford, and make King of England, is freely rumored to be not verily the son of your lawful husband Lord Henry but the child of tall Manuel of Poictesme. I say to you that from the first you have made mischief in England. And I say to you — "

But Dame Alianora was yawning quite frankly. " You will say to me that I brought foreigners into England, that I misguided the King, that I stirred up strife between the King and his barons. Eh, my God! I am sufficiently familiar with the harangue. Yet do you listen, my Osmund! They sold me like a bullock to a man I had never seen. I found him a man of wax, and I remoulded him. They asked of me an heir for England: I provided that heir. They gave me England as a toy; I played with it. I was the Queen, the source of honor, the source of wealth, — the trough, in effect, about which swine gathered. Never since I came into England, Osmund, has any man or woman loved me; never in all my English life, since Manuel ran away from me at Woodstock, and went sneaking back to that damned wife of his, have I loved any man or woman. Do you not understand, my Osmund? — the Queen has many flatterers, but no friends. Not one friend in the whole world, my Osmund! And so the Queen made the best of it and amused herself."

Somewhat he seemed to understand, for he answered without asperity: " Mon bel esper, I do not find it anywhere in Holy Writ that God requires it of us to amuse ourselves: but upon many occasions we have been commanded to live righteously. We are tempted in divers and insidious ways. And we cry with the Psalmist, 'My strength is dried up like a potsherd.' But God intends this, since, until we who are His children have here demonstrated our valor upon Satan, we are manifestly unworthy to be enregistered in the Supreme Father's army. The great Captain must be served by proven soldiers. We may be tempted, but we may not yield. O daughter of the South! we must not yield!"

"Again you preach," Dame Alianora said. "That is a venerable truism."

"Ho, madame," he returned, "is it on that account the less true?"

Pensively the Queen considered this. "You are a good man, my Osmund," she said, at last, "though you are very droll. Ohimé! it is a pity that I was born a princess! Had it been possible for me to become in reality your wife, as I am now pretending to be, I would have been a better woman. I shall sleep now, and dream of that virtuous and stupid and contented woman I might have been."

So presently these two slept in Chantrell Wood.

Followed four days of journeying. As Messer Dante had not yet surveyed Malebolge, Osmund Heleigh and Dame Alianora lacked a parallel for that which they encountered; their traverse discovered England razed, charred, and depopulate,—picked bones of an island, a vast and absolute ruin about which passion-wasted men skulked like rats.

Messire Heleigh and the Queen traveled without molestation; malice and death had journeyed before them on this road, and had swept it clear.

At every trace of these hideous precessors Osmund Heleigh would say, "By a day's ride I might have prevented this." Or, "By a day's ride I might have saved this woman." Or, "By two days' riding I might have fed this child."

The Queen kept Spartan silence, but daily you saw the fine woman age. In their slow advance every inch of misery was thrust before her for inspection; meticulously she observed and evaluated her handiwork. Enthroned, she had appraised from a distance the righteous wars she set afoot; trudging thus among the débris of these wars, she found they had unlooked-for aspects.

Bastling the royal army had recently sacked. There remained of this village the skeletons of two houses, and, for the rest, a jumble of bricks, of ashes, of rafters half-burned, and of odds and ends of human bodies. At Bastling, Messire Heleigh turned to the Queen toiling behind.

"Oh, madame!" he said, in a dry whisper, "this was the home of so many men!"

"I burned it," Dame Alianora replied. "That man we passed just now I killed. Those other men and women, — it was because of me that they are dead. And little children, my Osmund! The hair like flax, blood-dabbled!"

"Oh, madame!" he wailed, in the extremity of his pity.

For she stood with eyes shut, all gray. The Queen demanded:

"Why have they not slain me? Was there no man in England to strangle the provoker of this ruining? Are you all cowards here?"

He said: "I detect in the affair only one coward. Your men, and Leicester's men also, ride about the world, and draw sword and slay and die for the right as they see it. And you and Leicester contend for the right as ye see it. But I, madame! I! I, who sat snug at home spilling ink and trimming rosebushes! God's world, madame, and I in it afraid to speak a word for Him! God's world, and a curmudgeon in it grudging God that life which the Heavenly Father gave!" The man flung out his soft hands and snarled: "We are tempted in divers and insidious ways. But I, who rebuked you! behold, now, with how gross a snare was I entrapped!"

"I do not understand, my Osmund."

"I was afraid, madame," he returned, dully. "Everywhere men fight; at every moment death clutches the unwary; and I am afraid to die."

So they stood silent in the ruins of Bastling.

"Of a piece with our lives," Dame Alianora said at last. "All ruin, my Osmund."

Messire Heleigh answered: "Presently men will build here, my Queen. Presently, as in legend was reborn the Arabian bird, arises from these ashes a lordlier and more spacious town."

The Queen replied: "If from that circumstance you deduce that presently we two shall be ranked among the cherubim, I question your logic. I question also if I would find them congenial. But I do not question that I have somewhat mismanaged affairs."

They went forward. The next day chance loosed upon them Gui Camoys, lord of Bozon, Foliot, and Thwenge, who, riding alone through Poges Copse, found there a man and a woman over their limited supper. The woman had thrown back her hood, and Camoys drew rein to stare at her. Lispingly he spoke the true court dialect.

"Ma belle," said this Camoys, in friendly condescension, "n'estez vous pas jongleurs?"

She paused, with dilatory caution, for Camoys had leaped from his horse, giving a great laugh.

"A prize! ho, an imperial prize!" Camoys shouted. "A peasant woman with the Queen's face, who speaks French! And who, madame, is this? Have you by any chance brought pious Lewis from oversea? Have I bagged a brace of monarchs?"

Here was imminent danger, for Camoys had known the Queen some fifteen years. Messire Heleigh rose, his five days' beard glinting like hoarfrost as his mouth twitched.

"I am Osmund Heleigh, messire, younger brother to the Earl of Brudenel."

"I have heard of you, I believe, — the fellow who spoils parchment. This is odd company, however, Messire Heleigh, for Brudenel's brother."

"A gentleman must serve his Queen, messire. As Cicero very justly observes — "

"I am inclined to think that his political opinions are scarcely to our immediate purpose. This is a high matter, Messire Heleigh. To let the sorceress pass is, of course, out of the question; upon the other hand, I observe that you lack weapons of defense. Yet if you will have the kindness to assist me in unarming, your courtesy will place our commerce upon a more equal footing."

Osmund had turned very white. "I am no swordsman, messire —"

"Now, this is not handsome of you," Camoys began. "I warn you that people will speak harshly of us if we lose this opportunity of gaining honor. And besides, the woman will be burned at the stake. Plainly, you owe it to all three of us to fight."

" — But I refer my cause to God. I am quite at your service."

"No, my Osmund! " Dame Alianora then cried. "It means your death."

He spread out his hands. "That is God's affair, madame."

"Are you not afraid? " she breathed.

"Of course I am afraid," said Messire Heleigh, irritably.

After that he unarmed Camoys, and presently they faced each other in their tunics. So, for the first time in the journey, Osmund's long falchion saw daylight. He had thrown away his dagger, as Camoys had none.

The combat was sufficiently curious. Camoys raised his left hand. He said:

"So help me God and His saints, I have upon me neither bone, stone, nor witchcraft wherethrough the power and the word of God might be diminished or the Devil's power increased."

Osmund made similar oath. "Judge Thou this woman's cause!" he cried, likewise.

Then Gui Camoys shouted, as a herald might have done, "Laissez les aller, laissez les aller, laissez les aller, les bons combatants!" and warily each moved toward the other.

On a sudden Osmund attacked, desperately apprehensive of his own cowardice. Camoys lightly eluded him and slashed at Osmund's undefended thigh, drawing much blood. Osmund gasped. He flung away his sword, and in the instant, catching Camoys under the arms, threw him to the ground. Messire Heleigh fell with his opponent, who in stumbling had lost his sword, and thus the two struggled unarmed, Osmund atop. But Camoys was the younger man, and Osmund's strength was ebbing rapidly by reason of his wound. Now Camoys' tethered horse, rearing with nervousness, tumbled his master's flat-topped helmet into the roadway. Osmund caught up this helmet and with it battered Camoys in the face, dealing severe blows.

"God!" Camoys cried, his face all blood.

"Do you acknowledge my quarrel just?" said Osmund, between horrid sobs.

"What choice have I?" replied Gui Camoys, very sensibly.

So Osmund rose, blind with tears and shivering. The Queen bound up their wounds as best she might, but Camoys was much dissatisfied.

"For private purposes of His own, madame," he observed, "and doubtless for sufficient reasons, God has singularly favored your cause. I am neither a fool nor a pagan to question His decision, and you two may go your way unhampered. But I have had my head broken with my own helmet, and this I consider to be a proceeding very little conducive toward enhancing my reputation. Of your courtesy, messire, I must entreat another meeting."

Osmund shrank as if from a blow. Then, with a short laugh, he conceded that this was Camoys' right, and they fixed upon the following Saturday, with Poges Copse as the rendezvous.

"I would suggest that the combat be to the death," Gui Camoys said, "in consideration of the fact it was my own helmet. You must undoubtedly be aware, Messire Heleigh, that any such affront is virtually without a parallel."

This, too, was agreed upon.

Then, after asking if they needed money, which was courteously declined, Gui Camoys rode away, and sang as he went. Osmund Heleigh remained motionless. He raised quivering hands to the sky.

"Thou hast judged!" he cried. "Thou hast judged, O puissant Emperor of Heaven! Now pardon! Pardon us twain! Pardon for unjust stewards of Thy gifts! Thou hast loaned this woman dominion over England, with all instruments to aid Thy cause, and this trust she has abused. Thou hast loaned me life and manhood, agility and wit and strength, all instruments to aid Thy cause. Talents in a napkin, O God! Repentant we cry to Thee. Pardon for unjust stewards! Pardon for the ungirt loin, for the service shirked, for all good deeds undone! Pardon and grace, O King of kings!"

Thus he prayed, while Gui Camoys sang, riding deeper into the tattered, yellowing forest. By an odd chance Camoys had lighted on that song made by Thibaut of Champagne — beginning Signor, saciez, ki or ne s'en ira, — which denounces all half-hearted servitors of Heaven; and this he sang with a lilt gayer than his matter countenanced. Faintly, now came to Osmund and the Queen the sound of Camoys' singing, and they found it, in the circumstances, ominously apt.

Sang Camoys:

"Et vos, par qui je n'oi onques aïe, Descendez tuit en infer le parfont."

"That is an evil omen," Osmund Heleigh considered. "I pray for our forgiveness. And a song answers me, madame, predicting that it is such persons as we who must by and by descend into the lowest pits of hell."

Dame Alianora shivered, ever so slightly, with distaste. She said:

"I may have made mistakes. But I am sure I never meant any harm, and I am sure, too, that God will be more sensible about it than are you poets."

They slept that night in Ousley Meadow, and the next afternoon came safely to Bristol. You may learn elsewhere with what rejoicing the royal army welcomed the Queen's arrival, how courage quickened at sight of the generous virago. In the ebullition Messire Heleigh was submerged, and Dame Alianora during the course of that tumultuous Thursday saw nothing more of him.

Friday there were counsels, requisitions, orders signed, a memorial despatched to Pope Urban, chief of all a letter (this in the Queen's hand throughout) privily conveyed to the Lady Maude de Mortemer, who shortly afterward contrived Prince Edward's escape from her husband's gaolership. There was much sowing of a seed, in fine, that eventually flowered victory. There was, however, no sign of Osmund Heleigh, though by Dame Alianora's order he was sought.

On Saturday at seven in the morning he came to her lodging, in complete armor. From the open helmet his wrinkled face, showing like a wizened nut in a shell, smiled upon her questionings.

"I go to fight Gui Camoys, madame and Queen."

Dame Alianora said, "You go to your death!"

He answered: "That is true. Therefore I am come to bid you farewell."

The Queen stared at him for a while; on a sudden she broke into a curious fit of deep but tearless sobbing, which yet bordered upon laughter, too.

"Mon bel esper," said Osmund Heleigh, gently, "what is there in all this worthy of your sorrow? The man will kill me; granted, for he is my junior by some fifteen years, and is, in addition, a skilled swordsman. I fail to see that this is lamentable. Back to Longaville I cannot go, after this week's doings, for it would be ungenerous to put upon my own brother the need of hanging me himself. Here I must, in any event, shortly take to the sword, since a beleaguered army has very little need of ink-pots; and shortly I must be killed in some skirmish, dug under the ribs perhaps by a greasy fellow I have never seen. I prefer a clean death at a gentleman's hands."

"It is I who bring about your death!" she said.

"You gave me gallant service, and I have requited you with death, and it is a great pity."

"Indeed, the debt is to the other side. The services I rendered you were such as any gentleman must render a woman in distress. Naught else have I afforded you, madame, save very anciently a Sestina. Ho, a Sestina! And in return you have given me a Sestina of fairer make, — a Sestina of days, six days of manly common living."

His eyes were fervent: and the Queen wondered, a little enviously, at this pedant's endless folly.

She kissed him upon each cheek, saying, "Farewell, my champion!"

"Ay, your champion. In the twilight of life old Osmund Heleigh rides forth to defend the quarrel of Alianora of Provence. Reign wisely, my Queen, so that hereafter men may not say I was slain in an evil cause! Do not, I pray you, shame my maiden venture at a man's work!"

The Queen replied, half-wistfully, "My Osmund, you have a folly that is divine; and I lack it!"

He caught her by each wrist, and stood crushing both her hands to his lips, with fierce staring: and then put her from him, crying:

"I have not failed you! Praise God, I have not failed you!"

From her window she saw him ride away, a rich flush of glitter and color. In new armor with a smart emblazoned surcoat the lean pedant sat conspicuously erect; and as he went he sang defiantly, taunting the weakness of his flesh.

Sang Osmund Heleigh:

"Love sows, but lovers reap; and ye will see
The loved eyes lighten, feel the loved lips cling
Never again when in the grave ye be
Incurious of your happiness in spring,
And get no grace of Love there, whither he
That bartered life for love no love may bring."

So he rode away and thus out of our history. But in the evening Gui Camoys came into Bristol under a flag of truce, and behind him heaved a litter wherein lay Osmund Heleigh's dead body.

"For this man was frank and courteous," Camoys said to the Queen, "and in the matter of the reparation he owed me acted very handsomely. It is fitting that he should have honorable interment."

"That he shall not lack," the Queen said, and she unclasped from Osmund's wrinkled neck the thin gold chain, to which was fastened now no locket. "There was a portrait here," she said; "the portrait of a woman whom he loved in his youth, Messire Camoys. And all his life that locket lay above his heart."

Camoys answered, stiffly: "I imagine this same locket to have been the object which Messire Heleigh flung into the river, shortly before we began our combat. I do not rob the dead, madame."

"Well," the Queen said, "he always did queer things, and so, I shall always wonder what sort of lady he picked out to love, but it is none of my affair."

Yet she waited for a while, looking down at the thin dead face. The Queen was troubled. All her life long, it seemed to her, Alianora of Provence was to be troubled by the romanticism of these men who would not go about any matters sensibly.

Afterward she returned to her morning's work of signing the necessary death-warrants and requisitions in the King's name. But Osmund Heleigh she had interred at Ambresbury, commanding it to be written on his tomb that he died in the Queen's cause.

How the same cause prospered (Nicolas concludes), how presently Dame Alianora reigned again in England and with what wisdom, and how in the end this proud, unmanageable Queen died a nun at Ambresbury and all England wept therefor, — this you may learn elsewhere. I have chosen to record six days of a long and eventful life; and (as Messire Heleigh might have done) I say modestly with him of old, Majores majora sonent. Nevertheless, I assert that many a forest was once a pocketful of acorns.

THE END OF THE FIRST NOVEL

II

THE STORY OF THE TENSON

" Plagues à Dieu ja la nueitz non falhis,
Ni 'l mieus amicx lonc de mi no s partis,
Ni la gayta jorn ni alba ne vis.
Oy Dieus! oy Dieus! de l' alba tan tost ve! "

The Story of the Tenson

IN the year of grace 1265 (Nicolas begins), about the festival of Saint Peter ad Vincula, the Prince de Gâtinais came to Burgos. Before this time he had lodged for three months in the district of Ponthieu; and the object of his southern journey was to assure the tenth Alphonso, called the Astronomer, then ruling in Castile, that the latter's sister Ellinor, now resident at Entréchat, was beyond any reasonable doubt the transcendent lady whose existence old romancers had anticipated, howsoever cloudily, when they fabled in remote time concerning Queen Heleine of Sparta.

There was a postscript to this news. The world knew that the King of Leon and Castile desired to be King of Germany as well, and that at present a single vote in the Diet would decide between his claims and those of his competitor, Earl Richard of Cornwall. Messire de Gâtinais chaffered fairly; he had a vote, Alphonso had a sister. So that, in effect, — ohé, in effect, he made no question that his Majesty understood!

The Astronomer twitched at his beard and demanded if the fact that Ellinor had been a married woman these ten years past was not an obstacle to the plan which his fair cousin had proposed?

Here the Prince was accoutred cap-à-pie, and hauled out a paper. Dating from Viterbo, Clement, Bishop of Rome, servant to the servants of God, desirous of all health and apostolical blessing for his well-beloved son in Christ, stated that a compact between a boy of fifteen and a girl of ten was an affair of no particular moment; and that in consideration of the two infant convenantors never having clapped eyes upon each other since the ceremony, — even had not the groom's father been for several days betrothed in marriage to the bride's mother some thirty years ago, — a fact which rendered any marriage between their children an obvious enormity, in the opinion of three canonical authorities, each one of whom was duly cited, — why, that, in a sentence, and for all his learned, coy verbosity, the new pontiff remained amenable to reason, as touched the question of a divorce.

So in a month it was settled. Alphonso would give his sister to Gâtinais, and in exchange get the latter's vote to make Alphonso King of Germany; and Gui Foulques of Sabionetta — now Clement, fourth Pope to assume that name, — would annul the previous marriage, and in exchange get an armament to serve him against King Manfred, that lately enthroned and trouble-making tyrant of Sicily and Apulia. The scheme promised to each one of them that which he in particular desired, and messengers were presently sent into Ponthieu.

It is now time we put aside these Castilian matters and speak of other things. In England, Prince Edward had fought, and won, a shrewd battle at Evesham. People said, of course, that such behavior was less in the manner of his nominal father, King Henry, than reminiscent of Count Manuel of Poictesme, whose portraits, certainly, the Prince resembled to an embarrassing extent. Either way, the barons' power was demolished, there would be no more internecine war; and spurred by the unaccustomed idleness, Prince Edward began to think of the foreign girl whom he had not seen since the day he wedded her. She would be a woman by this time, and it was befitting that he claim his wife.

He rode with Hawise Bulmer and her baby to Ambresbury, and at the gates of the nunnery they parted, with what agonies are immaterial to this history's progression; the tale merely tells that, having thus decorously rid himself of his mistress, the Prince went into Lower Picardy alone, riding at adventure as he loved to do, and thus came to Entréchat, where his wife resided with her mother, the Countess Johane.

In a wood near the castle he approached a company of Spaniards, four in number, with their horses tethered while these men (Oviedans, as they told him) drank about a great stone which served them for a table. Being thirsty, he asked and was readily accorded hospitality. The five fell into amicable discourse. One fellow asked the stranger's name and business in those parts, and the Prince gave each without hesitancy as he reached for the bottle, and afterward dropped it just in time to catch, cannily, with his naked left hand, the knife-blade with which the rascal had dug at the unguarded ribs.

The Prince was astounded, but he was never a subtle man: here were four knaves who, for reasons unexplained — but to them of undoubted cogency, — desired his death. Manifestly, here was an actionable difference of opinion; so he had his sword out and killed the four of them.

Presently came to him an apple-cheeked boy, habited as a page, who, riding jauntily through the forest, lighted upon the tall Prince, now in bottomless vexation. The lad drew rein, and his lips outlined a whistle. At his feet were several dead men in various conditions of dismemberment. And seated among them, as if throned upon this boulder, was a gigantic and florid person, so tall that the heads of few men reached to his shoulder; a person of handsome exterior, high-featured and blond, having a narrow, small head, and vivid light blue eyes, and the chest of a stallion; a person whose left eyebrow had an odd oblique droop, so that the stupendous man appeared even at his most earnest moments to be winking the information that he spoke in jest.

"Fair friend," said the page. "God give you joy! and why have you converted this forest into a shambles?"

The Prince told him as much of the half-hour's action as has been narrated. "I have perhaps been rather hasty," Sire Edward considered, by way of peroration, "and it vexes me that I did not spare, say, one of these lank Spaniards, if only long enough to ascertain why, in the name of Termagaunt, they should have desired my destruction."

But midway in this tale the boy had dismounted, with a gasp, and he was now inspecting the features of one carcass. "They served your brother-in-law, the Astronomer, my Prince. You have slain some eight yards of Castilian felony which might have cheated the gallows had they got the Princess Ellinor safe to Burgos. Only two days ago this chalk-eyed fellow conveyed to her a letter."

Prince Edward said, "You appear, lad, to be somewhat overheels in the confidence of my wife."

Now the boy arose, and flung back his head in laughter. "Your wife! Oh, God have mercy! Your wife, and for ten years left to her own devices! Why, look you, to-day you and your wife would not know each other were you two brought face to face."

Prince Edward said, "That is very near the truth."

But, indeed, it was the absolute truth, and as it concerned him was already attested.

"Sire Edward," the boy then said, "your wife has wearied of this long waiting till you chose to whistle for her. Last summer the young Prince de Gâtinais came into these parts, and he is a desirous fine prince who whistles quite handsomely." The page made plain all that which Etienne de Gâtinais and King Alphonso had planned. "I, Miguel de Rueda, am her page, my lord. I was to follow her. These fellows were to be my escort, and were to ward off possible pursuit. Cry haro, beau sire! Cry haro, and do you shout it lustily, for your wife in company with six other knaves is at large between here and Burgos, — that unreasonable wife who grew dissatisfied after a mere ten years of neglect."

"I have been remiss," the Prince said, and one huge hand strained at his chin; "yes, perhaps I have been remiss. Yet, it had appeared to me — But as it is, I bid you mount, my lad!"

The boy demanded, "And to what end?"

"Oy Dieus, messire! have I not killed your escort? Why, in common reason, equity demands that I afford you my protection so far as Burgos, messire, just as plainly as equity demands that I then kill this Etienne de Gâtinais and fetch back my wife into England."

The page wrung exquisite hands with a gesture which was but partially tinged with anguish, and presently began to laugh. Afterward these two rode southerly, in the direction of Castile.

For it appeared to the intriguing little woman a diverting jest that in this fashion her husband should be the promoter of her evasion. It appeared to her yet more diverting that in two days' space she had become honestly fond of him. She found him rather slow of comprehension, and she was humiliated by the discovery that not an eyelash of the man was irritated by his wife's decampment; he considered, to all appearances, that some property of his had been stolen, and he intended, quite without passion, to repossess himself of it, after, of course, punishing the thief.

This troubled the Princess somewhat; and often, riding by her stolid husband's side, the girl's heart raged at memory of the decade so newly overpast which had kept her always dependent on the charity of this or that ungracious patron, — on anyone who would take charge of her while the truant husband fought out his endless squabbles in England. Slights enough she had borne during the period, and squalor, and physical hunger also she had known, who was the child of a king and a saint.[1] But now she rode toward the dear southland; and presently she would be rid of this big man, when he had served her purpose; and afterward she meant to wheedle Alphonso, just as she had always wheedled him, and later still, she and

[1] She was the daughter of King Ferdinand of Castile and Leon whose conversion to sainthood, through the assistance of Dom Manuel of Poictesme, the inquisitive may find recorded elsewhere.

Etienne would be very happy: in fine, to-morrow was to be another day.

So these two rode southward, and Prince Edward found this new page of his — this Miguel de Rueda, — a jolly lad, who whistled and sang inapposite snatches of balladry, without any formal ending or beginning, descanting always with the delicate irrelevancy of a bird-trill.

Sang Miguel de Rueda:

" Man's Love, that leads me day by day
Through many a screened and scented way,
Finds to assuage my thirst
No love that may the old love slay,
None sweeter than the first.

" Fond heart of mine, that beats so fast
As this or that fair maid trips past,
Once, and with lesser stir,
We viewed the grace of love, at last,
And turned idolater.

" Lad's Love it was, that in the spring
When all things woke to blossoming
Was as a child that came Laughing, and filled with wondering,
Nor knowing his own name —"

" And still I would prefer to think," the big man interrupted, heavily, " that Sicily is not the only al-lure. I would prefer to think my wife so beautiful — And yet, as I remember her, she was nothing extraordinary."

The page a little tartly said that people might forget a great deal within ten years.

The Prince continued his unriddling of the scheme hatched in Castile. "When Manfred is driven out of Sicily they will give the throne to this Gâtinais. He intends to get both a kingdom and a handsome wife by this neat affair. And, in reason, England must support my Uncle Richard's claim to the German crown, against the pretensions of the Astronomer. France will join with us. The Italian princes will divide, as will the German lords. But all will be in the affair, perforce — Why, my lad, I ride southward to prevent a war that would embroil entire Europe between Spain and Muscovy! "

"You ride southward in the attempt to rob a miserable woman of her sole chance of happiness," Miguel de Rueda estimated.

"That is undeniable, if she loves this thrifty Prince, as, indeed, I do not question my wife does. Yet our happiness here is a trivial matter, whereas war is a great disaster. You have not seen — as I, my little Miguel, have often seen, — a man viewing his death-wound with a face of stupid wonder, a bewildered wretch in point to die in his lord's quarrel and understanding never a word of it. You have not observed, with distaste, a woman's twisted and naked body, the breasts yet horribly heaving, in the red ashes of some village, or the already dripping hoofs which will presently crush this body. Well, it is to prevent many such ugly spectacles hereabout that I ride southward."

Miguel de Rueda shuddered. Men always hunted out so many morbid reasons for your not doing that which you preferred to do.

"Nevertheless, she has her right to happiness," the page said.

"She has only one right," the Prince retorted; "because it has pleased the Emperor of Heaven to appoint us twain to lofty stations, to entrust to us the five talents of the parable; whence is our debt to Him, being fivefold, so much the greater than is that of common persons. Therefore, the more is it our sole right, being fivefold, to serve God without faltering, and therefore is our happiness, or our unhappiness, the more an inconsiderable matter. For, as I have read in the Annals of the Romans — " He launched upon the story of King Pompey and his daughter, whom a certain duke regarded with impure and improper emotions. "My little Miguel, that ancient king is our Heavenly Father, that only daughter is the rational soul of us, which is here delivered for protection to five soldiers, — that is, to the five senses, — to preserve it from the Devil, the world, and the flesh. But, alas! the too-credulous soul, desirous of gazing upon the gaudy vapors of this world — "

"You whine like a canting friar," the page complained; "and I can assure you that the Lady Ellinor was prompted rather than hindered by her God-given faculties of sight and hearing and so on when she fell in love with Etienne de Gâtinais. Of you two, he is, beyond any question, the handsomer and the more intelligent man, and it was God who bestowed on her sufficient wit to perceive the superiority of Gâtinais. And what am I to deduce from this? "

The Prince reflected. At last he said:

"I have also read in these same Gestes how Seneca mentions that in poisoned bodies, on account of the malignancy and the coldness of the poison, no worm will engender; but if the body be smitten by lightning, in a few days the carcass will abound with vermin. My little Miguel, both men and women are at birth empoisoned by sin, and then they produce no worm, — that is, no virtue. But once they are struck with lightning, — that is, by the grace of God, — then they are astonishingly fruitful in good works."

The page began to laugh. "You are hopelessly absurd, my Prince, though you will never know it, — and I hate you a little, — and I envy you a great deal."

"I can see no reason for envying me," Prince Edward said, in misapprehension, for the man was never quick-witted, — "since it is not for my own happiness that I ride southward."

The page then said, "What is her name?"

Prince Edward answered, very fondly, "Hawise."

"I hate her, too," said Miguel de Rueda; "and I think that the holy angels alone know how profoundly I envy her."

In the afternoon of the same day they neared Ruffec, and at the ford found three brigands ready, two of whom the Prince slew, and the other fled.

Next night they supped at Manneville, and they sat afterward beneath the poplar trees of the little square that lay before their inn. Miguel had procured a lute from the innkeeper, and Miguel strummed idly as these two debated together of great matters; about them was an immeasurable twilight, moonless, but tempered by many stars, and everywhere they could hear an agreeable whispering of leaves.

"Listen, my Prince," the page said: "here is one view of the affair."

And Miguel de Rueda began to chant, without rhyming, without raising the singer's voice above the pitch of talk, while the lute monotonously accompanied this chanting.

Sang Miguel:

"Passeth a little while, and Irus the beggar and Menephtah the high king are at sorry unison, and Guenevere is a skull. Multitudinously we tread to- ward oblivion, as ants hasten toward sugar, and presently Time cometh with his broom. Multitudinously we tread a dusty road toward oblivion; but yonder the sun shines upon a grass-plot, converting it into an emerald; and I am aweary of the trodden path.

"Vine-crowned is that fair peril who guards the grasses yonder, and her breasts are naked. 'Vanity of Vanities!' saith the belovèd. But she whom I love seems very far away to-night, although I might be with her if I willed it. And she may not aid me now, for love is not all-powerful. She is most dear of created women, and very wise, but she may not ever understand that at any time one grows aweary of the trodden path.

"At sight of my belovèd, love closes over my heart like a flood. For the sake of my belovèd I have striven, with a good endeavor, to my tiny uttermost. Pardie, I am not Priam at the head of his army! A little while and I will repent; to-night I cannot but remember that there are women whose lips are of a livelier tint, that life is short at best, that wine evokes in me some liking for myself, and that I am aweary of the trodden path.

"My belovèd is very far from me to-night. Yonder in the Hörselberg they exult and make sweet songs, songs which are sweeter, immeasurably sweeter, than is this song of mine; but in the trodden path I falter, for I am tired, I am tired in every fiber of me, and I am aweary of the trodden path."

Followed a silence. "Ignorance spoke there," the Prince said. "It is the song of a woman, or, else, of a boy who is very young. Give me the lute, my little Miguel."

Sang the Prince:

"I was in a path, and I trod toward the citadel of the land's Seigneur, and on either side were pleasant forbidden meadows, having various names. And one treading with me babbled of the brooding mountains and of the low-lying and adjacent clouds; of the west wind and of the budding fruit-trees. He debated the significance of these things, and he went astray to gather violets, while I walked in the trodden path.

"He babbled of genial wine and of the alert lips of women, of swinging censers and of the serene countenances of priests, and of the clear, very lovely colors of bread and butter, and his heart was troubled by a world profuse in beauty. He did not consider serious things. He leaped a stile to share his allotted provision with a dying dog, and afterward, being hungry, a wall to pilfer apples, while I walked in the trodden path.

"He babbled of Autumn's bankruptcy and of the age-long lying promises of Spring; and of his own desire to be at rest; and of running waters and of decaying leaves. He babbled of the far-off stars; and he debated whether they were the eyes of God or gases which burned, and he proved to me, by the best rules of logic, that neither gas nor God existed. At times he stumbled as he stared about him and munched his apples, so that he was all bemired, but I walked in the trodden path.

"Now the path led to the gateway of a citadel, and through the gateway. 'Let us not enter,' he said, 'for the citadel is vacant, and, moreover, I am in profound terror, and, besides, I have not as yet eaten all my apples.' And he wept aloud, but I was not afraid, for I had walked in the trodden path."

Again there was a silence. "You paint a dreary world, my Prince."

"My little Miguel, I paint the world as the Eternal Father made it. The laws of the place are written large, so that all may read them; and we know that every road, whether it be my trodden path or some by-way through your gayer meadows, yet leads in the end to God. We have our choice, — or to come to Him as a laborer comes at evening for the day's wages fairly earned, or to come as a roisterer haled before the magistrate."

"I consider you perhaps to be in the right," the page said, after a lengthy interval, "although I decline — and I decline emphatically, — to believe you."

The Prince laughed. "There spoke Youth," he said, and he sighed as though he were a patriarch.

"But we have sung, we two, the Eternal Tenson of God's will and of man's desires. And I claim the prize, my little Miguel."

Suddenly the page kissed one huge hand. "All the more solid prizes of this world belong to you and to your like, my very dull and very glorious Prince. Concerning that Hawise —"

But Miguel de Rueda said no more.

Then the Prince laid one hand upon his page's hair, and he smiled in the darkness to note how soft was this hair, because the man was less a fool than at first view you might have taken him to be. The Prince said:

"One must play the game out fairly, my lad. We are no little people, she and I, the children of many kings, of God's regents here on earth; and it was never reasonable, my Miguel, that gentlefolk should cheat at their dicing."

The same night Miguel de Rueda repeated the prayer which Saint Theophilus made long ago to the Mother of God:

"Dame, je n'ose,
Flors d'aiglentier et lis et rose,
En qui li filz Diex se repose," and so on. Or, in other wording: "Hearken, O gracious Lady! thou that art more fair than any flower of the eglantine, more comely than the blossoming of the rose or of the lily! thou to whom was confided the very Son of God! Hearken, for I am afraid! afford counsel to me that am ensnared by Satan and know not what to do! Never will I make an end of praying. O Virgin débonnaire! O honored Lady! Thou that wast once a woman — ! "

So the girl prayed; and upon the next day as these two rode southward, she sang half as if in defiance.

Sang Miguel:

" And still, — whatever years impend
To witness Time a fickle friend,
And Youth a dwindling fire, —
I must adore till all years end
My first love, Heart's Desire.

" I may not hear men speak of her
Unmoved, and vagrant pulses stir
To greet her passing-by,
And I, in all her worshiper,
Must serve her till I die.

" For I remember: this is she
That reigns in one man's memory
Immune to age and fret,
And stays the maid I may nor see
Nor win to, nor forget."

It was on the following day, near Bazas, that they encountered Adam de Gourdon, a Provençal knight, with whom the Prince fought for a long while, without either contestant giving way. In consequence a rendezvous was fixed for the November of that year, in order that the two might meet and fight comfortably until one of them was killed, and afterward the Prince and Adam de Gourdon parted, highly pleased with each other.

Thus the Prince and his attendant came, in late September, to Mauléon, on the Castilian frontier, and dined there at the Fir Cone. Three or four lackeys were about. They perhaps belonged to some exalted person's retinue. It was Prince Edward who hazarded this surmise, speaking to the swart little landlord, as the Prince and Miguel lingered over the remnants of their meal.

Yes, the fellow informed them: the Prince de Gâtinais had lodged there for a whole week, watching the north road, as circumspect of all passage as a cat over a mouse-hole. Eh, monseigneur expected some one, doubtless, — a lady, it might be, — the gentlefolk had their escapades like everyone else. The innkeeper babbled vaguely, for on a sudden he was very much afraid of his gigantic patron.

"You will lead me to his room," Prince Edward said, with a politeness that was ingratiating.

The host shuddered and obeyed.

The disguised Princess, left alone, sat quite silent, her finger-tips drumming upon the table. She rose suddenly and flung back her shoulders, all resolution. On the stairway she passed the black little landlord, who was now in a sad twitter, foreseeing bloodshed. But the Princess went on to the room above. The door was ajar. She paused there.

Etienne de Gâtinais had risen from his dinner and stood facing the door. He, too, was a blond man and the comeliest of his day. And at sight of him awoke in the woman's heart all the old tenderness; handsome and brave and witty she knew him to be, as indeed the whole world knew this nobleman to be distinguished by every namable grace; and the innate weakness of Etienne de Gâtinais, which she alone suspected, made him now seem doubly dear. Fiercely she wanted to shield him, less from bodily hurt than from that self-degradation which she cloudily apprehended to be at hand; the test was come, and Etienne would fail. Thus much she knew alone, with a sick and illimitable surety.

"O Madame the Virgin!" prayed Miguel de Rueda, "thou that wast once a woman, even as I am now a woman! grant that the man may slay him quickly! grant that he may slay Etienne very quickly, honored Lady, so that my Etienne may die unshamed!"

"I must question," Gâtinais was saying, "whether you have been well inspired. Yes, quite frankly, I do await the arrival of her who is your nominal wife; and your intervention at this late stage, I take it, can have no outcome save to render you absurd. So, come now! do you be advised by me, messire —"

Prince Edward said, "I am not here to talk."

"— For, messire, I grant you that in ordinary disputation the cutting of one gentleman's throat by another gentleman is well enough, since the argument is unanswerable. Yet in this case we have each of us too much to live for; you to govern your reconquered England, and I — you perceive that I am candid, — to achieve in turn the kingship of another realm. Now, to secure this realm, possession of the Lady Ellinor is to me essential: to you she is nothing."

"She is a woman whom I have deeply wronged," Prince Edward said, "and to whom, God willing, I mean to make atonement. Ten years ago they wedded us, willy-nilly, to avert the impending war between Spain and England: to-day the Astronomer intends to purchase Germany, with her body as the price, and you mean to get Sicily, as her husband. Mort de Dieu! is a woman thus to be bought and sold like hog's-flesh! We have other and cleaner customs, we of England."

"Eh, and who purchased the woman first?" Gâtinais spat at him, viciously, for the Frenchman now saw his air-castle shaken to the corner-stone.

"They married me to the child in order that a great war might be averted. I acquiesced, since it appeared preferable that two people suffer inconvenience rather than many thousands be slain. And still this is my view of the matter. Yet afterward I failed her. Love had no clause in our agreement: but I owed her more protection than I have afforded. England has long been no place for women. I thought she would comprehend that much. But I know very little of women. Battle and death are more wholesome companions, I now perceive, than such folk as you and Alphonso. Woman is the weaker vessel, — the negligence was mine, — I may not blame her."

The big and simple man seemed in an agony of repentance.

On a sudden he strode forward, his sword now shifted to his left hand, and with his right hand outstretched. "One and all, we are weaklings in the net of circumstance. Shall one herring, then, blame his fellow if his fellow jostle him? We walk as in a mist of error, and the Devil is fertile in allurements: yet always it is granted us to behold that sin is sin. I have perhaps sinned in anger, Messire de Gâtinais, more deeply than you have planned to sin through luxury and through ambition. Let us therefore cry quits, and afterward part in peace, and in common repentance!"

"And yield you Ellinor?" Gâtinais said. "Oh, no, messire! I reply to you with Arnaud de Marveil, that marvelous singer of eld, 'They may bear her from my presence, but they can never untie the knot which unites my heart to her; for that heart, so tender and so constant, God alone divides with my lady, and the portion which God possesses He holds but as a part of my lady's absolute domain, and as her vassal.' "

"This is blasphemy," Prince Edward retorted, "and for such observations alone you merit death. Will you always talk and talk and talk? I perceive that the devil is far more subtle than you, and leads you, like a pig with a ring in his nose, toward gross iniquity. Messire, I tell you that for your soul's health I doubly mean to kill you now. So, let us make an end of this! "

Gâtinais turned, and took up his sword. "Since you will have it," he rather regretfully said; "yet I repeat that you play an absurd part. Your wife has deserted you. She has fled in abhorrence of you. For more than a week now she has been tramping God knows whither or in what company — "

He was here interrupted. "What Dame Ellinor has done," Prince Edward crisply said, "was at my request. We were wedded at Burgos; it was natural that we should desire our reunion to take place at Burgos: and she came to Burgos with an escort which I provided."

Gâtinais sneered. "So that is the tale you will deliver to the world? "

"After I have slain you," the Prince said, "yes."

"The reservation is wise. For if I were dead, Messire Edward, no living man would know that you risk all for a drained goblet, for an orange already squeezed — quite dry, messire."

"Face of God!" the Prince said. "And do you speak of my wife thus!"

But Etienne de Gâtinais flung back both arms in a great gesture, so that he knocked a flask of claret from the table at his rear. "I am candid, my Prince. I would not see any brave gentleman slain in a cause so foolish. Therefore, I kiss and tell. In effect, I was eloquent, I was magnificent, — so that in the end her coyness was shattered like the wooden flask yonder at our feet. Is it worth while, think you, that our blood should flow like this flagon's contents?"

"Liar!" Prince Edward said, very softly. "O hideous liar! Already your eyes shift!" He drew near and struck the Frenchman. "Talk and talk and talk! and lying talk! I am ashamed while I share the world with a thing as base as you."

Gâtinais hurled upon him, cursing, and sobbing in unrestrained fury. Then for an instant the place resounded like a smithy, for there were no stronger swordsmen living than these two. The eavesdropper could distinguish nothing clearly in that instant. To all sides of the room, and now round and round, the two men veered in a demolishing whirl of turmoil, through that mad instant.

Then Prince Edward trod upon the broken flask, smashing it. His foot slid far in the spilth of wine, and the huge body went down like an oak, his head striking one leg of the table. He lay there stunned.

"A candle!" Gâtinais cried. He was panting now.

He cried, "King of Sicily!" He cried, "For this I vow a hundred candles to the Virgin of Beaujolais!"

He shortened his sword to stab the Prince of England.

The eavesdropper came through the doorway. She flung herself between Prince Edward and the descending sword. The point of it dug deep into her shoulder, so that she shrieked once with the cold pain of this wound. Then she rose, ashen.

"Liar!" she said. "Oh, I am shamed while I share the world with a thing as base as you!"

In silence Gâtinais regarded her. His lips worked. There was an interval before he said, "Ellinor!" and then once more he said, "Ellinor!" like a man whispering.

"I was eloquent, I was magnificent," she said, "so that in the end her coyness was shattered! Certainly, it is not your death which I desire, since a man dies so very, very quickly. I desire for you — I do not know what I desire for you!" the girl wailed.

"You desire that I should endure this present moment," Gâtinais replied: "for, as God reigns, I love you, of whom I have spoken infamy; and my shame is very bitter."

She said: "And I loved you once. It is strange to think of that."

"I was afraid. Never in my life have I been afraid before to-day. But I was afraid of this terrible and fair and righteous man. I saw all hope of you vanish, all hope of Sicily, — in effect, I lied as a cornered snake spits out his venom."

"I know," she answered. "Give me water, Etienne."

She washed and bound the Prince's head with a vinegar-soaked napkin. Ellinor sat sidewise upon the floor. The big man's head rested upon her knee.

"He will not die of this, for he is of strong person. Look you, Messire de Gâtinais, you and I are not strong. We are so fashioned that we can enjoy only the pleasant things of life. But this man can enjoy — enjoy, mark you, — the commission of any act, howsoever distasteful, if he thinks it to be his duty. There is the difference. I cannot fathom him. But it is now necessary that I become all which he loves — since he loves it, — and that I be in thought and deed whatever his toplofty notions require. For I have heard the Tenson through."

"You love him! " said Gâtinais.

She glanced upward with a pitiable smile. "No. It is you whom I love — somewhat, — even now. You cannot understand how at this moment each bit of me, — in body and heart and soul, — is longing just to comfort you, and to give you all which you desire, my Etienne, and to make you happy and self-confident once more, my handsome Etienne, at howsoever dear a cost. No: you will never understand that. And since you may not understand, I merely bid you go and leave me with my husband."

And then there fell between these two an infinite silence.

"Nevertheless," Etienne de Gâtinais said, by and by, "you should grant me some little credit for what I do. You are alone; the man is powerless. My fellows are within call. A word secures the Prince's death; a word gets me you and Sicily. And I do not speak that word, for you are my lady as well as his, and your will is my one law."

But there was no mercy in the girl, no more for him than for herself. The big head lay upon her breast; she caressed the gross hair of it ever so lightly.

"These are tinsel oaths," she crooned, as if rapt with incurious content; "these are the old empty protestations of all you strutting poets. A word would get you what you desire! Then, why do you not speak that word? Why do you not speak many words, and become once more as eloquent as you were just now, when you contrived that adultery about which you were telling my husband?"

Gâtinais raised clenched hands. "I am shamed," he said; and then he said, "It is just."

He left the room and presently rode away with his men. I say that, here at last, he had done a knightly deed, but she did not think about this. She did not raise her head as the troop clattered from Mauléon, with a lessening noise of hoof-beats which lapsed now into the blunders of an aging fly who doddered about the window yonder.

She stayed thus, motionless, her meditations adrift in the future. That which she foreread left her not all sorry nor profoundly glad, for living seemed by this time to be not the merry and colorful business which she had esteemed it, but immeasurably the more worth while, — perhaps. As yet, she could not tell.

The Third Novel. — Meregrett of France, thinking to preserve a hoodwinked gentleman, annoys a spider; and by the grace of destiny the web of that cunning insect entraps a butterfly, a wasp, and then a god; who shatters it.

The Story of the Rat-Trap

IN the year of grace 1298, a little before Candlemas (thus Nicolas begins), came to the first King Edward of England — about whose doings when he was but a Prince I have told you in the preceding tale, — exceedingly distasteful letters from his kinsman and ambassador to France, Earl Edmund of Lancaster. It was perfectly apparent, the Earl wrote, that the French King meant to surrender to the Earl's lord and brother neither the province of Gascony nor the Lady Blanch. This lady, I must tell you, was now affianced to King Edward, whose first wife, Dame Ellinor, had died eight years before this time, after a quarter-century of reasonably contented married life.

The courier found Sire Edward at Ipswich, midway in celebration of his daughter's marriage to the Count of Holland. The King read the letters through and began to laugh; and presently broke into a rage such as was possible (men whispered) only to the demon-tainted blood of Oriander's descendants. Next day the keeper of the privy purse entered upon the household-books a considerable sum "to make good a large ruby and an emerald lost out of his coronet when the King's Grace was pleased to throw it into the fire " ; and upon the same day the King recalled Lancaster.

The King then despatched yet another embassy into France to treat about Sire Edward's marriage. This last embassy was headed by the Earl of Aquitaine: his lieutenant was Lord Pevensey, the King's natural son by Hawise Bulmer.

The Earl got audience of the French King at Mezelais. Walking alone came this Earl of Aquitaine, with a large retinue, into the hall where the barons of France stood according to their rank; in unadorned russet were the big Earl and his attendants, but upon the scarlets and purples of the French lords many jewels shone: it was as though through a corridor of gayly painted sunlit glass that the grave Earl came to the daïs where sat King Philippe.

The King had risen at close sight of the new envoy, and had gulped once or twice, and without speaking, had hurriedly waved his lords out of earshot. The King's perturbation was very extraordinary.

" Fair cousin," the Earl now said, without any prelude, " four years ago I was affianced to your sister, Dame Blanch. You stipulated that Gascony be given up to you in guaranty, as a settlement on any children I might have by that incomparable lady. I assented, and I yielded you the province, upon the understanding, sworn to according to the faith of loyal kings, that within forty days you would return to me its seignory as your vassal. And I have had of you since then neither my province nor my betrothed wife, but only excuses, Sire Philippe."

With eloquence the Frenchman touched upon the emergencies to which the public weal so often drives men of high station, and upon his private grief over the necessity — unavoidable, alas! — of returning a hard answer before the council; and became so voluble that Sire Edward merely laughed in that big-lunged and disconcerting way of his, and afterward lodged for a week at Mezelais, nominally passing by his minor title of Earl of Aquitaine, and as his own ambassador.

Negotiations became more swift of foot, since a man serves himself with zeal. In addition, the French lords could make nothing of a politician so thick-witted that he replied to every consideration of expediency with a parrot-like reiteration of the circumstance that already the bargain was signed and sworn to: in consequence, while daily they fumed over his stupidity, daily he gained his point. During this period Sire Edward was, upon one pretext or another, very often in the company of his affianced wife, Dame Blanch.

This lady, I must tell you, was the handsomest of her day; there could nowhere be found a creature more agreeable to every sense; and she compelled the adoring regard of men, it is recorded, not gently but in an imperious fashion. Sire Edward, who, until this time, had loved her merely by report, and, in accordance with the high custom of old, through many perusals of her portrait, now appeared besotted. He was now an aging man, near sixty, huge and fair, with a crisp beard, and the bright unequal eyes of Manuel of Poictesme. The better-read at Mezelais began to liken this so candidly enamored monarch and his Princess to Sieur Hercules at the feet of Queen Omphale.

The court hunted and slew a stag of ten in the woods of Ermenoueïl, which stand thick about the château; and at the hunt's end, these two had dined at Rigon the forester's hut, in company with Dame Meregrett, the French King's younger sister. She sat a little apart from the betrothed pair, and she looked out of the hut's one window. Of her thoughts there is no record: but we know, nowadays, it was not merely the trees she was considering.

Dame Blanch seemed undisposed to mirth. "We have slain the stag, beau sire," she said, "and have made of his death a brave diversion. To-day we have had our sport of death. Presently the gay years wind past us, as our cavalcade came toward the stag, and God's incurious angel slays us, much as we slew the stag. And we shall not understand, and we shall wonder, as the stag did, in helpless wonder. Thus Death will have his sport of us, as if in atonement." Her big eyes shone, as when the sun glints upon a sand-bottomed pool. "Ohé, I have known such happiness of late, beau sire, that I am hideously afraid to die."

The King answered, "I too have been very happy of late."

"But it is profitless to talk about death thus drearily. Let us flout him, instead, with some gay song."

Thereupon she handed Sire Edward a lute.

The King accepted it. "Death is not reasonably mocked by any person," Sire Edward said, "since in the end he conquers, and of the lips that gibed at him remains but a little dust. Rather, should I, who already stand beneath a lifted sword, make for my destined and inescapable conqueror a Sirvente, which is the Song of Service."

Sang Sire Edward:[1]

"I sing of Death, that comes unto the king,
And lightly plucks him from the cushioned throne;
And drowns his glory and his warfaring
In unrecorded dim oblivion;
And girds another with the sword thereof;
And sets another in his stead to reign;
And ousts the remnant, nakedly to gain
Styx' formless shore and nakedly complain
Midst twittering ghosts lamenting life and love.

[1] Not without indulgence in anachronism. But Nicolas, be it repeated, was no Gradgrindian.

" For Death is merciless: a crack-brained king
He raises in the place of Prester John,
Smites Priam, and mid-course in conquering
Bids Cæsar pause; the wit of Salomon,
The wealth of Nero and the pride thereof,
And battle-prowess — or of Tamburlaine
Darius, Jeshua, or Charlemaigne, —
Wheedle and bribe and surfeit Death in vain,
And get no grace of him nor any love.

" Incuriously he smites the armored king
And tricks his counsellors — "

" True, O God! " murmured the tiny woman, who sat beside the window yonder. With that, Dame Meregrett rose, and passed from the room.

The two lovers had noticed, but they paid little heed to, her outgoing. Sire Edward had put aside the lute, and sat now regarding the Princess. His big left hand propped the bearded chin; his grave countenance was flushed, and his intent eyes shone under their shaggy brows, very steadily, although the left eye was now so nearly shut as to reveal the merest spark.

Irresolutely, Dame Blanch plucked at her yellow gown. She rearranged a fold of it, and with composure awaited the ensuing action, afraid at bottom, but not at all ill-pleased; and she looked downward.

The King said: " Never before were we two alone, madame. Fate is gracious to me this morning."

"Fate," the lady considered, "has never denied much to the Hammer of the Scots."

"She has denied me nothing," he returned, "save the one thing that makes this business of living seem a rational proceeding. Fame and power and wealth fate has accorded me, no doubt, but never the common joys of life. And, look you, my Princess, I am of aging person now. During some thirty years I have ruled England according to my interpretation of God's will as it was anciently made manifest by the holy Evangelists; and during that period I have ruled England not without odd by-ends of commendation: yet behold, to-day I forget the world-applauded, excellent King Edward, and I remember only Edward Plantagenet — hot-blooded and desirous man! — of whom that much-commended king has made a prisoner all these years."

"It is the duty of exalted persons," Blanch unsteadily said, "to put aside such private inclinations as their breasts may harbor — "

He replied, "I have done what I might for the happiness of every Englishman within my realm saving only Edward Plantagenet; and now I think his turn to be at hand."

Then the man kept silence; and his hot appraisal daunted her.

"Lord," she presently faltered, "lord, you know that we are already betrothed. Love cannot extend his laws between husband and wife, since the gifts of love are voluntary, and husband and wife are but the slaves of duty — "

"Troubadourish nonsense!" Sire Edward said; "yet it is true that the gifts of love are voluntary. For that reason I cry out to you. And I cry, Ha, most beautiful, what have you and I to do with all this chaffering over Gascony?"

The two had risen. They stood very close to each other now.

Blanch said, "It is a high matter — " Then on a sudden the full-veined girl was aglow. "It is a trivial matter."

He took her in his arms, since already her cheeks flared in scarlet anticipation of the event.

Thus holding her, he wooed the girl tempestuously. Here, indeed, was Sieur Hercules enslaved, burned by a fiercer fire than that of Nessus, and here was the huge bulk of the unconquerable visibly shaken by his adoration. In a disordered tapestry of verbiage, aflap in winds of passion, the lady presently beheld herself prefigured by Balkis, the Judean's lure, and by that Princess of Cyprus who reigned in Aristotle's time, and by Nicolete, the King's daughter of Carthage, — since the first flush of morning was as a rush-light before her resplendency, the man swore. In conclusion, he likened her to a modern Countess of Tripolis, for love of whom he, like Rudel, had cleft the seas, and losing whom he must inevitably die as did Rudel. Sire Edward snapped his fingers now over any consideration of Gascony. He would conquer for her all Muscovy and all Cataia, too, if she desired mere acreage. Meanwhile he wanted her; and his hard and savage passion beat down opposition as if with a bludgeon.

"Heart's emperor," the girl replied, after so much rhetoric had well run its course, "I think that you were cast in some larger mould than we of France. Oh, none of us may dare resist you! and I know that nothing matters, nothing in all the world, save that you love me. Then take me, since you will it, — and take me not as King, since you will otherwise, but as Edward Plantagenet. For, by good luck, you have this afternoon despatched Rigon for Chevrieul, where to-morrow we were to hunt the great boar. So to-night this hut will be unoccupied."

The man was silent. He had a large gift that way when occasion served.

"Here, then, beau sire! here, then, at nine, you are to meet me with my chaplain. Behold, he marries us, as glibly as though we two were peasants. Poor king and princess!" cried Dame Blanch, in a fond voice which thrilled him, "shall ye not, then, dare to be but man and woman?"

"Ha!" the King said. "So the chaplain makes a third! Well, the King is pleased to loose his prisoner, that long-imprisoned Edward Plantagenet: and I will do it."

Therefore he came that night, without any retinue, and habited as a forester, with a horn swung about his neck, into the unlighted hut of Rigon the forester, and he found a woman there, though not the woman whom he had reason to expect.

"Treachery, beau sire! Horrible treachery!" she wailed.

"I have encountered it," the big man said, "before this evening."

"Presently will come to you not Blanch but Philippe, with many men to back him. And presently they will slay you. You have been trapped, beau sire. Ah, for the love of God, go! Go, while there is yet time!"

Sire Edward reflected. Undoubtedly, to light on Edward Longshanks alone in a forest would appear to King Philippe, if properly attended, a tempting chance to settle divers difficulties, once for all; and Sire Edward knew the conscience of his familiar opponent to be invulnerable. The act would violate the core of hospitality and knighthood, no doubt, but its outcome would be a very definite gain to France, and, for the rest, merely a dead body in a ditch. There was not a monarch in Christendom, Sire Edward reflected, but feared and in consequence hated the Hammer of the Scots, and, in further consequence, would not lift a finger to avenge him. Nor would any being in the universe rejoice more heartily at the success of Philippe's treachery than would Sire Edward's son and immediate successor, the young Prince Edward of Caernarvon. Taking matters by and large, Philippe had all the powers of common-sense to back him in contriving an assassination.

What Sire Edward said was, "Dame Blanch, then, knew of this?"

But Meregrett's pitying eyes had answered him; and he laughed a little.

"In that event, I have to-night enregistered my name among the goodly company of Love's Lunatics — as yoke-fellow with Dan Merlin in his thornbush, and with wise Salomon when he capered upon the high places of Chemosh, and with Duke Ares sheepishly agrin in the net of Mulciber. Rogues all, madame! fools all! yet always the flesh trammels us, and allures the soul to such sensual delights as bar its passage toward the eternal life wherein alone lies the empire and the heritage of the soul? And why does this carnal prison so impede the soul? Because Satan once ranked among the sons of God, and the Eternal Father, as I take it, has not yet forgotten the antique relationship. Hence it is permitted even in our late time that always the flesh rebel against the spirit, and that always these so tiny and so thin-voiced tricksters, these highly tinted miracles of iniquity, so gracious in demeanor and so starry-eyed —"

Then he turned and pointed, no longer the orotund zealot but the expectant captain. "Look, my Princess!" In the pathway by which Sire Edward had approached the hut now stood a man in full armor like a sentinel. " Mort de Dieu, we can but try to get well out of this," Sire Edward said.

" You should have tried without talking so much," replied Meregrett.

She followed him. And presently, in a big splash of moonlight, the armed man's falchion glittered across their way.

" Back," he bade them, " for by the King's orders, I can let no man pass."

" It would be very easy now to strangle this herring," Sire Edward reflected, candidly.

" But it is not easy to strangle a whole school of herring," the fellow retorted. " Hoh, Messire d'Aquitaine, the bushes of Ermenoueïl are alive with my associates. The hut yonder, in effect, is guarded by them, — and we have our orders to let no man pass from out of that hut."

" Have you any orders concerning women? " the King said.

The man deliberated. Sire Edward handed him three gold pieces.

" There was assuredly no specific mention of petticoats," the soldier now recollected, " and in consequence I dare to pass the Princess, against whom certainly nothing can be planned."

" Why, in that event," Sire Edward said, " we two had as well bid each other adieu."

But Meregrett only said, " You bid me go? "

He waved his hand. " Since there is no choice.

For that which you have done — howsoever tardily, — I thank you. Meantime I return to Rigon's hut to rearrange my toga as King Cæsar did when the assassins fell upon him, and to encounter with due decorum whatever Dame Luck may prefer."

She said, "Death waits for you in that hut."

He shrugged his broad shoulders. "Death is inquisitive, madame. He desires to meet everybody. And in the end he does."

Dame Meregrett turned, and without faltering passed back into the hut.

When he had lighted the inefficient lamp which he found there, Sire Edward wheeled upon her in half-humorous vexation. "Presently come your brother and his tattling lords. To be discovered here with me at night, alone, means trouble for you. If Philippe chances to fall into one of his Capetian rages it means for you an ending of all troubles."

She answered, as though she were thinking about other matters, "Yes."

Now, for the first time, Sire Edward regarded her with profound consideration. To the finger-tips this so-little lady showed a descendant of the holy Lewis whom he had known and loved in old years. Small and thinnish she was, with soft and profuse hair that, for all its blackness, gleamed in the lamplight with stray ripples of brilliancy, as you may see sparks shudder to extinction over burning charcoal. She had the Valois nose, long and delicate in form, and overhanging a short upper-lip; yet the lips were glorious in tint, and the whiteness of her skin would have matched the Hyperborean snows tidily enough. As for her eyes, the customary similes of the court poets were gigantic onyxes or ebony highly polished and wet with May dew. These eyes were too big for her little face: they made of her a tiny and desirous wraith which nervously endured each incident of life, like a foreigner uneasily acquiescent to the custom of the country.

Sire Edward moved one step toward this tiny lady, and then paused. "Madame, I do not understand."

Dame Meregrett looked up into his face unflinchingly. "It means that I love you, sire. I may speak without shame now, for presently you die. Die bravely, sire! Die in such fashion as may hearten me to live."

The little Princess spoke the truth, for always since his coming to Mezelais she had viewed the great conqueror as if through an aweful haze of forerunning rumor, twin to that golden vapor which enswathes a god and transmutes whatever in corporeal man would have been a defect into some divine and hitherto unguessed-at excellence. I must tell you in this place, since no other occasion offers, that even until the end of her life it was so. For, to her, what in other persons would have seemed flagrant dulness showed somehow, in Sire Edward, as the majestic deliberation of one that knows his verdict to be decisive, and therefore appraises cautiously; and if sometimes his big, irregular, calm eyes betrayed not the least ray of understanding as to one or another jest at which her lips were laughing, and of which her keener wits approved, then always within that instant her heart convinced her a god is not lightly moved to mirth.

And now it was a god — O deus certè! — who had taken a woman's paltry face between his hands, half roughly. "And the maid is a Capet!" Sire Edward mused.

"Blanch has never desired you any ill, beau sire. But she loves the Archduke of Austria. And once you were dead, she might marry him. One cannot blame her," Meregrett considered, "since he wishes to marry her, and she wishes to make him happy."

The King said: "Yet I too hanker after this same happiness; and my admiration for that cantankerous despoiler whom I praised this morning is somewhat abated. There was a Tenson once — Lord, Lord, how long ago it was that two persons sang in Manneville! And I learn too late that truth may possibly have been upon the losing side — "

Thus talking incoherencies, he took up Rigon's lute.

Sang Sire Edward:

"Incuriously he smites the armored king
And tricks his counsellors —

yes, the jingle ran thus. Now do you listen, madame, while I have my singing out, no matter what any little cutthroats may be planning in dark corners."

Sang Sire Edward:

" — As, later on,
Death will, half-idly, still our pleasuring,
And change for fevered laughter in the sun
Sleep such as Merlin's, — and excess thereof, —
Whence we, divorceless Death our Viviaine
Implacable, may never more regain
The unforgotten rapture, and the pain
And grief and ecstasy of life and love.

" For, presently, as quiet as the king
Sleeps now that planned the keeps of Ilion,
We, too, will sleep, whilst overhead the spring
Rules, and young lovers laugh — as we have done, —
And kiss — as we, that take no heed thereof,
But slumber very soundly, and disdain
The world-wide heralding of winter's wane
And swift sweet ripple of the April rain
Running about the world to waken love.

" We shall have done with Love, and Death be king
And turn our nimble bodies carrion,
Our red lips dusty; — yet our live lips cling
Despite that age-long severance and are one

Despite the grave and the vain grief thereof,—
Which we will baffle, if in Death's domain
Fond memories may enter, and we twain
May dream a little, and rehearse again
In that unending sleep our present love.

"Speed forth to her in halting unison,
My rhymes: and say no hindrance may restrain
Love from his aim when Love is bent thereon;
Yea, say to her, though Death now said, 'Refrain,
Lest I exact life's instant end thereof,'
I know that even as the weather-vane Follows the wind so would I follow Love."

Sire Edward put aside the lute. "Thus ends the Song of Service," he said, "which was made not by the King of England but by Edward Plantagenet — hot-blooded and desirous man! — in honor of the one woman who within more years than I care to think of has at all considered this Edward Plantagenet."

"I do not comprehend," she said. And, indeed, she dared not comprehend.

But now he held both tiny hands in his hands. "At best, your poet is an egoist. I must die presently. Meantime I crave largesse, madame, and a great almsgiving, so that in his unending sleep your poet may rehearse our present love."

Then Sire Edward strode to the window, and he raised his hands toward the spear-points of the aloof stars. "Master of us all!" he cried; "O Father of us all! the Hammer of the Scots am I! the Scourge of France, the conqueror of Llewellyn and of Leicester, and the flail of the accursed race that slew Thine only Son! the King of England am I, who have made of England an imperial nation, and have given to Thy Englishmen new laws! And to-night I crave my hire. Never, O my Father, have I had of any person aught save reverence or hatred! never in my life has any person loved me! And I am old, my Father, — I am old, and presently I die. As I have served Thee, — as Jacob wrestled with Thee at the ford of Jabbok, — at the place of Peniel —" Against the tremulous blue and silver of the moonlit forest the Princess saw that this all-conquering giant too was tremulous. "My hire! my hire!" he hoarsely said. "Forty long years I have served Heaven lovingly with never-ending bloodshed and destruction. And now I will not let Thee go except Thou hear me, and grant me life and this dear woman's love."

He turned, stark and black in the rearward splendor of the moon. "As a prince hast thou power with God," he calmly said, "and thou hast prevailed. For the King of kings was never obdurate, my dear, to them that have deserved well of Him. So He will attend to my request, and He will get us out of this pickle somehow."

Even as he said this, Philippe the Handsome came into the room, and at the heels of the French King were seven lords, armed completely.

The French King was an odd man. Subtly smiling, he came forward through the twilight, with soft, long strides, and he made no outcry at recognition of his sister.

"Take the woman away, Victor," he said, disinterestedly, to Montespan.

Afterward Philippe sat down beside the table and remained silent for a while, intently regarding Sire Edward and the tiny woman who clung to Sire Edward's arm; and in the flickering gloom of the hut Philippe smiled as an artist may smile who gazes on the perfected work and knows it to be adroit.

"You prefer to remain, my sister?" he said, presently. "Hé bien! it happens that to-night I am in a mood for granting almost any favor. A little later I will attend to your merits." The fleet disordering of Philippe's face had now lapsed again into the meditative smile of Lucifer watching over a toasted soul. "And so it ends," he said. "So England loses to-night the heir that Manuel the Redeemer provided. Conqueror of Scotland, Scourge of France! O unconquerable king! and will the worms of Ermenoueïl, then, pause to-morrow to consider through what a glorious turmoil their dinner came to them?"

"Do you design to murder me?" Sire Edward said.

The French King shrugged. "I design that within this moment my lords shall slay you while I sit here and do not move a finger. Is it not good to be a king, my cousin, and to sit quite still, and to see your bitterest enemy hacked and slain, — and all the while to sit quite still, quite unruffled, as a king should always be? Eh, eh! I never lived until to-night! "

"Now, by Heaven," said Sire Edward, "I am your kinsman and your guest, I am unarmed — "

Philippe bowed his dark head. "Undoubtedly," he assented, "the deed is foul. But I desire Gascony very earnestly, and so long as you live you will never permit me to retain Gascony. Hence it is quite necessary, you conceive, that I have you killed. What! " he presently said, "will you not beg for mercy? I had hoped that you might be afraid to die, O huge and overrighteous man, and would entreat me to spare you. It would have pleased me to have the conqueror of three great kingdoms begging me for mercy. But these sins which damn one's soul are in actual performance very tedious affairs; and I begin to grow aweary of a game in which you will not properly play your part. Hé bien! now kill this man for me, messieurs! "

The English King strode forward. It was now evident that Sire Edward found the prospect of being murdered wholly displeasing. Before it he displayed something of that large irritability which had once led him to throw the crown of England into the fire-place. And he cried out:

"Will I not beg for mercy! This is past belief! You face-making baby, do you think to snare a lion with such a flimsy rat-trap? Wise persons do not hunt lions with these contraptions. It is the nature of a rat-trap, my fair cousin, to ensnare not the beast which imperiously desires and takes in daylight, but the tinier and the filthier beast that covets meanly and attacks under the cover of darkness, — as do you and your seven skulkers! "

The man was rather terrible; not a Frenchman within the hut but had drawn back a little.

"Listen! " Sire Edward said, and he came yet farther toward the King of France and shook at him one forefinger; "when you were in your cradle I was leading armies. When you were yet unbreeched I was lord of half Europe. For thirty years I have driven kings before me as did Fierabras. Am I, then, a person to be hoodwinked by the first big-bosomed huzzy that elects to waggle her fat shoulders and to grant an assignation in a forest so conveniently designed to be the scene of a murder? You baby, is the Hammer of the Scots the man to trust for one half moment a Capet? Ill-mannered infant," the King said, with bitter laughter, "it is now necessary that I summon my attendants and remove you to a nursery which I have prepared in England."

He set the horn to his lips, and he blew three blasts.

There came into the hut many armed warriors, bearing ropes. Here was the entire retinue of the Earl of Aquitaine. Cursing, Sire Philippe sprang upon the English King, and with a dagger struck full at the impassive big man's heart. The knife broke against the mail armor under the tunic.

"Have I not told you," Sire Edward wearily said, "that I came into France knowing well what to expect of a Capet? Now, gentlemen, do you bind these cutthroats and convey them whither I have directed you. Nay, but, Roger — "

He conversed apart with his son, the Earl of Pevensey, and what Sire Edward commanded was done. The French King and seven lords of France went from that hut trussed like chickens ready for the oven.

And now Sire Edward turned toward Meregrett, and he chafed his big hands gleefully. "At every tree-bole a tethered horse awaits us; and a ship awaits our party at Fécamp. To-morrow we sleep in England, — and, Mort de Dieu! do you not think, madame, that once within my very persuasive Tower of London, your brother and I may reach, after all, some agreement as to the return of my stolen Gascony? "

She had shrunk from him. "Then the trap was yours! It was you that lured my brother to this infamy! "

"In effect, I planned it many months ago at Ipswich yonder," Sire Edward gayly said. "Faith of a gentleman! your brother has cheated me out of Gascony, and was I to waste eternity in begging him to give me back my province? Oh, no, for I have many spies in France, and have for some two years known your brother and your sister to the bottom. Granted that I came hither incognito, to forecast your kinfolk's immediate endeavors was none too difficult; and I wanted Gascony, — and, in consequence, the person of your brother. As the seasoned hunter adapts his snare to the qualities of his prey, and takes the elephant through his curiosity, so have I taken this snake through his treachery."

But the little Princess wrung her hands. "I am this night most hideously shamed. Beau sire, I came hither to aid a brave man infamously trapped. I have found here an alert spider, snug in his cunning web, and patiently waiting until the gnats of France fly near enough. Eh, the greater fool was I to waste my labor on this shrewd and evil thing which has no more need of me than I have of it! So now let me go hence, sire! Could I have come to the brave man I had dreamed of, I would have come cheerily through the murkiest lane of hell; as the more artful knave, as the more judicious trickster" — and here she thrust him from her, — "I spit upon you. Now let me go hence!"

He took her in his brawny arms. "Fit mate for me," he said. "Little vixen, had you done otherwise I would have devoted you to the Devil."

Still grasping her, and victoriously lifting Dame Meregrett, so that her feet swung clear of the floor, Sire Edward said, again with that queer touch of fanatic gravity: "My dear, you are perfectly right. I was tempted, I grant you. But it was never reasonable that gentlefolk should cheat at their dicing. Therefore I whispered Roger Bulmer my final decision; and he is now loosing all my captives in the courtyard of Mezelais, after birching the tails of every one of them as soundly as these infants' pranks to-night have merited. So you perceive that I do not profit by my trick; and that I lose Gascony, after all, in order to come to you with hands — well! not intolerably soiled."

"Oh, now I love you!" she cried, athrill with disappointment to find him so unthriftily high-minded. "Yet you have done wrong, for Gascony is a king's ransom."

He smiled. Presently one arm swept beneath her knees, so that presently he held her as one dandles a baby; and presently his stiff and graying beard caressed her burning cheek. He said:

"Then let Gascony serve as such, and let it ransom for a king his glad and common manhood! Now it appears expedient that I leave France without any unwholesome delay, because these children may resent being spanked. Meanwhile I have already in my pocket the Pope's dispensation permitting me to marry, in spite of our near cousinship, the sister of the King of France. And it would be a pity, I think, to waste that dispensation."

Very shyly Dame Meregrett lifted her little mouth. She said nothing because talk was not necessary.

In consequence, after a good deal of political tergiversation (Nicolas concludes), in the year of grace 1299, on the day of our Lady's nativity, and in the twenty-seventh year of King Edward's reign, came to the British realm, and landed at Dover, not Dame Blanch, as would have been in consonance with seasoned expectation, but Dame Meregrett, the other daughter of King Philippe the Bold; and upon the following day proceeded to Canterbury, whither on the next Thursday after came Edward, King of England, into the Church of the Trinity at Canterbury, and therein espoused the aforesaid Dame Meregrett.

The Fourth Novel. — Ysabeau of France, desirous of distraction, looks for recreation in the torment of a certain knight, whom she proves to be no more than human; but in the outcome of her holiday he confounds this queen by the wit of his reply.

The Story of the Choices

IN the year of grace 1327 (thus Nicolas begins) you could have found in all England no couple more ardent in affection or in despair more affluent than Rosamund Eastney and Sir Gregory Darrell. She was Lord Berners' only daughter, a brown beauty, of extensive repute, thanks to a retinue of lovers who were practitioners of the Gay Science, and who had scattered broadcast innumerable canzons and all kinds of songs in her honor: and Lord Berners was a man to accept the world as he found it.

"Dompnedex!" the Earl was wont to say; "in sincerity I am fond of Gregory Darrell, and if he chooses to make love to my daughter that is none of my affair. The eyes and the brain preserve a proverbial warfare, which is the source of all amenity, for without lady-service there would be no songs and tourneys, no measure and no good breeding; and a man delinquent in domnei is no more to be valued than an ear of corn without the grain. No: I am so profoundly an admirer of Love that I can never willingly behold him slain, of a surfeit, by matrimony; besides, this rapscallion Gregory could not to advantage exchange purses with Lazarus in the parable; and, moreover, Rosamund is to marry the Earl of Sarum a little after All Saints' Day."

"Sarum!" people echoed. "Why, the old goat has had four wives already!"

And the Earl would spread his hands. "These redundancies are permissible to one of the wealthiest persons in England," he was used to submit.

Thus it fell out that Sir Gregory came and went at his own discretion as concerned Lord Berners' fief of Ordish, all through those choppy times of warfare between King Edward and Queen Ysabeau. Lord Berners, for one, vexed himself not inordinately over the outcome, since he protested the King's armament to consist of royal catamites, and the Queen's of royal paramours. So the easy-going, fat Earl had with entire serenity declined to back either Dick or the Devil.

But at last the Queen got resistless aid from Count William of Hainault (in a way to be told about hereafter), and the King was captured by her forces, and was imprisoned in Berkeley Castle. There they held the second Edward to reign in England, who was the unworthy son of Dame Ellinor and of that squinting King Sire Edward about whom I have told you in the two tales preceding this tale.

It was in the September of this year, a little before Michaelmas, that they brought Sir Gregory Darrell to be judged by the Queen; notoriously the knight had been her husband's adherent. "Death!" croaked

Adam Orleton, who sat to the right hand, and, "Young De Spencer's death!" amended the Earl of March, with wild laughter. But Ysabeau leaned back in her great chair, — a handsome woman, stoutening now from gluttony and from too much wine, — and she regarded her fettered prisoner with lazy amiability.

"And what was your errand in Figgis Wood?" she demanded, — "or are you mad, then, Gregory Darrell, that you dare ride past my gates alone?"

He curtly said, "I rode for Ordish."

The Queen deliberated this. Then the Queen said, to Roger Mortimer, — that Earl of March who now had been for two years her paramour in chief, — "Roger, do you give me the paper which I would not sign."

The Earl of March had drawn an audible breath. The Bishop of London somewhat wrinkled his shaggy brows, like a person in shrewd and epicurean amusement, while the Queen subscribed the parchment, with a large, scrawling flourish.

"Take, in the Devil's name, the hire of your dexterities," said Ysabeau. She pushed this document with her wet pen point toward March. "So! get it over with, that necessary business with my husband at Berkeley! And do the rest of you withdraw, saving only my prisoner."

Her orders were obeyed. Queen Ysabeau lolled in her tall carven chair, considering the comely gentleman who stood before her, fettered, at the point of shameful death. There was in the room a little dog which had come to the Queen, and now licked the palm of her left hand, and the soft lapping of its tongue was the only sound you heard.

"So at plain peril of your life you rode toward Ordish. Love is a ruthless master."

The tense man had flushed. "You have harried us of the King's party out of England, — and in reason I might not leave England without seeing the desire of my heart."

"My friend," said Ysabeau, as if half in sorrow, "I would have pardoned much. That I shall not pardon." She rose. Her face was dark and hot. "By God and all His saints! you shall indeed leave England to-morrow and the world also! but not without one final glimpse of this slut. I, too, will ride with you to Ordish, — as your sister, say — Gregory, did I not hang, last April, the husband of your sister? Yes, Ralph de Belomys, a thin man with eager eyes, the Earl of Farrington he was. As his widow I will ride with you to Ordish, upon condition that you disclose to none at Ordish, saving only, if you will, to this fine desire of Gregory Darrell's so steadfast heart, any word of the Queen's holiday. And to-morrow (you will swear according to the nicest obligations of honor) you must ride back with me to encounter — that which I may devise. For I dare to trust your naked word in this, and, moreover, I shall take with me a sufficiency of retainers to leave you no choice."

Darrell knelt before her. "I can do no homage to Queen Ysabeau; yet the prodigal hands of her who knows that I must die to-morrow, and who cunningly contrives, for old time's sake, to hearten me with a sight of Rosamund, I cannot but kiss." This much he did. "And I swear in all things to obey your will."

"O comely fool!" the Queen said, not ungently, "I contrive, it may be, but to demonstrate that many tyrants of antiquity were only bunglers. And, besides, I must have other thoughts than those which I have known too long. I must this night take holiday from thinking them, lest I go mad."

Thus did the Queen arrange her holiday.

"Either I mean to torture you to-morrow," Dame Ysabeau said, presently, to Darrell, as these two rode side by side, "or else I mean to free you. In sober verity I do not know. I am in a holiday humor, and it is as the whim may take me. But do you indeed love this Rosamund Eastney? And does she very humbly worship you?"

"It is my belief, madame, that when I see her I tremble visibly, and my weakness is such that a child has more intelligence than I, — and toward such misery any lady must in common reason be a little compassionate."

The Queen answered: "There is at least one lady who regards it without any compassion whatever.

Decidedly, I must torture you. Yes, I must perfect for you some very exquisite torture, for you have forgotten too many things. Moreover, it was as Le Desir du Cuer, was it not, my Gregory, that your verses were wont to address me, just as nowadays this Rosamund is the desire of your heart. You lack inventiveness."

His palms clutched at heaven. "There was a maiden once in France, madame, whom my loyal heart desires eternally. But that younger Ysabeau is dead! and all true joy is destroyed, and the world lies under a blight from which God has averted an unfriendly face in displeasure! yet of all wretched persons existent I am he who endures the most grievous anguish, for daily I partake of life without any relish, and there are moments, madame, when I would in truth deem him austerely kind who slew me, now that this younger Ysabeau is dead."

She shrugged wearily. "I scent the raw stuff of a planh," the Queen observed; "benedicite! it was ever your way, my friend, to love a woman chiefly for the verses she inspired."

The Queen began to sing, as they rode through Baverstock Thicket.

Sang Ysabeau:

"Man's love hath many prompters,
But a woman's love hath none;
And he may woo a nimble wit

Or hair that shames the sun,
Whilst she must pick of all one man
And ever brood thereon —
And for no reason,
And not rightly, —

" Save that the plan was foreordained (More old than Chalcedon,
Or any tower of Tarshish
Or of gleaming Babylon),
That she must love unwillingly
And love till life be done, —
He for a season,
And more lightly."

So to Ordish in that twilight came the Countess of Farrington, with a retinue of twenty men-at-arms, and her brother Sir Gregory Darrell. Lord Berners received the party with hospitality, and became astonishingly gallant.

" Age has not blinded my father to the fact that your sister is a very handsome woman," was Rosamund Eastney's comment. The period appears to have been after supper, and the girl sat with Gregory Darrell in not the most brilliant corner of the main hall.

The wretched man leaned forward, bit his nether lip, and then with a tumbling rush of speech told of the sorry masquerade. " The she-devil designs some horrible and obscure mischief, she plans I do not know what."

"Yet I —" said Rosamund. The girl had risen, and she continued with an odd inconsequence, "You have told me you were Pembroke's squire when long ago he sailed for France to fetch this woman into England —"

"— Which you never heard!" Lord Berners shouted at this point. "Jasper, a lute!" And then he halloaed, "Gregory, Madame de Farrington demands that racy song which you made against Queen Ysabeau during your last visit."

Thus did the Queen begin her holiday.

It was a handsome couple that came forward, with hand quitting hand tardily, and with blinking eyes yet rapt. These two were not overpleased at being disturbed, and the man was troubled, as in reason he well might be, by the task assigned him.

"Is it, indeed, your will, my sister," he said, "that I should sing — this song?"

"It is my will," the Countess said.

And the knight flung back his comely head and laughed. "A truth, once spoken, may not be disowned in any company. It is not, look you, of my own choice that I sing, my sister. Yet if Queen Ysabeau herself were to bid me sing this song, I could not refuse to be thus ungallant, for, Christ aid me! the song is true."

Sang Sir Gregory:

Dame Ysabeau, la prophécie
Qui li sage dit ne ment mie,
Que la royne sut ceus grever
Qui tantost laquais sot aymer —"[1] and so on. It was a lengthy ditty, and in its wording not oversqueamish; the Queen's career in England was detailed without any stuttering, and you would have found the catalogue unhandsome. Yet Sir Gregory delivered it with an incisive gusto, desperately countersigning his own death-warrant. Her treacheries, her addiction to paramours and strong drink, and the assassinations which she had contrived, were all rendered in the most glowing terms, whose vigor seemed, even now, to please their contriver.

Now, when Darrell had ended, the Countess of Farrington, without speaking, swept her left hand toward her cheek and by pure chance caught between thumb and forefinger the autumn-numbed fly that had annoyed her. She drew the little dagger from her girdle and meditatively cut the buzzing thing in two. She cast the fragments from her, and resting the dagger's point upon the arm of her chair, with one forefinger upon the summit of the hilt, she considerately twirled the glittering knife.

"This song does not err upon the side of clemency," she said, at last, "nor by ordinary does Queen Ysabeau."

[1] Nicolas gives this ballad in full, but, for obvious reasons, his translator would prefer to do otherwise.

"That she-wolf!" said Lord Berners, comfortably. "Hoo, Madame Gertrude! since the Prophet Moses wrung healing waters from a rock there has been no such miracle recorded."

"We read, Messire de Berners, that when the she-wolf once acknowledges a master she will follow him as faithfully as any dog. My brother, I do not question your sincerity, yet everybody knows you sing with the voice of an unhonored courtier. What if Queen Ysabeau had heard your song all through, as I have heard it, and then had said, — for she is not as the run of women, — 'Messire, I had thought until this that there was no thorough man in England save tall Roger Mortimer. I find him tawdry now, and — I remember. Come you, then, and rule the England that you love as you may love no woman, and rule me, messire, since I find even in your insolence that which is not displeasing —'" She had paused. She shrugged. "What if Queen Ysabeau, who is not as the run of women, had said this much, my brother?"

Darrell had put by the lute, and his hands were clenched. He said now:

"I would answer, my sister, that as she has found in England but one man, I have found in England but one woman, — the rose of all the world." His eyes were turned toward Rosamund Eastney. "And yet," the man continued, "because I, too, remember —"

"Hah, in God's name! I am answered," the Countess said. She rose. "We have ridden far to-day, and to-morrow we must travel a great deal farther, — eh, my brother? I am going to bed, Messire de Berners."

So the men and women parted. Madame de Farrington kissed her brother at leaving him, as was most natural; and the Queen went away singing hushedly.

Sang Ysabeau:

"Were the All-Mother wise, life (shaped another-wise)
Would be all high and true;
Could I be otherwise I had been otherwise
Simply because of you, . . .
With whom I have naught to do,
And who are no longer you!

"Life with its pay to be bade us essay to be
What we became, — I believe
Were there a way to be what it was play to be
I would not greatly grieve . . .
Hearts are not worn on the sleeve.
Let us neither laugh nor grieve!"

Ysabeau would have slept that night within the chamber of Rosamund Eastney had either slept. As concerns the older of the pair, I say nothing. The girl, though soon aware of frequent rustlings near at hand, lay quiet, half forgetful of the poisonous woman yonder. The girl was now fulfilled with a great blaze of exultation: to-morrow Gregory must die, and then perhaps she might find time for tears. Meanwhile, before her eyes, the man had flung away a kingdom and life itself for love of her, and the least nook of her heart ached to be a shade more worthy of the sacrifice.

After it might have been an hour of this excruciate ecstasy the Countess came to Rosamund's bed. "Ay," the woman began, "it is indisputable that his hair is like spun gold and that his eyes resemble sun-drenched waters in June. It is certain that when this Gregory laughs God is more happy. Girl, I was familiar with the routine of your meditations before you were born."

Rosamund said, quite simply: "You have known him always. I envy the circumstance, Madame Gertrude, — you alone of all women in the world I envy, since you, his sister, being so much older, must have known him always."

"I know him to the core, my girl," the Countess answered. For a while she sat silent, one bare foot jogging restlessly. "Yet I am two years his junior — Did you hear nothing, Rosamund? "

"No, Madame Gertrude, I heard nothing."

"Nevertheless," the Countess said, "let us have lights, since I can no longer endure this overpopulous twilight." She kindled three lamps. "It is as yet dark yonder, where the shadows quiver very oddly, as though they would rise from the floor, — do they not, my girl? — and would protest vain things. But, Rosamund, it has been done; in the moment of death men's souls have traveled farther and have been visible; it has been done, I tell you. And he would stand before me, with pleading eyes, and he would reproach me in a voice too faint to reach my ears, — but I would see him, — and his groping hands would clutch at my hands, as though a dropped veil had touched me; and at that touch I shall be going mad! "

" Now can it be that you talk of your dead husband, Madame Gertrude? "

" Poor innocent fool! " the woman said, " I am Ysabeau of France." And when Rosamund made as though to rise, in alarm, Queen Ysabeau caught her by the shoulder. " Do you bear witness when he comes that I never hated him. Yet for my quiet it was necessary that his scented, pampered body should suffer cruelly, and not any mark be left upon it. So even now he suffers! But I have lied. I hate the man, in such a fashion as you will comprehend when you are Sarum's wife."

" Madame and Queen! " the girl said, " you will not murder me! "

" I am tempted! " the Queen answered. " O little slip of girlhood, I am tempted, for it is not reasonable you should possess everything that I have lost. Innocence you have, and youth, and untroubled eyes, and quiet dreams, and the fond graveness of a child, and Gregory Darrell's love — " Now Ysabeau sat down upon the bed, and she caught up the girl's face between two fevered hands. " Rosamund, this Darrell perceives within this moment, as I perceive within this moment, that the love he bears for you is but what he remembers of the love he bore a certain maid long dead. Eh, you might have been her sister, Rosamund, for you are very like her. And she, poor wench, — why, I could see her now, I think, were my eyes not blurred, somehow, almost as though Queen Ysabeau might weep! But she was handsomer than you will ever be, my Rosamund, because your complexion is not anything to boast about, praise God! "

" Gregory has told me of his intercourse with you," the girl replied, and this was a lie flat-footed. " Nay, do you kill me if you will, madame, since you are the stronger, yet, with my dying breath, I will protest that Gregory has loved no woman truly in all his life except me."

The Queen laughed bitterly. " Do I not know men? He told you nothing. And to-night he hesitated, and to-morrow, at the lifting of my finger, he will supplicate. Since boyhood Gregory Darrell has loved me, O white, palsied innocence! He is mine at a whistle. And in that time to come he will desert you, Rosamund, — bidding you farewell with a pleasing canzon, — and they will give you to the gross Earl of Sarum, as they gave me to the painted man who yesterday was King of England. And in that time to come you will know your body to be your husband's makeshift when he lacks for his Gavestons and his De Spencers to play with him the games of Sodom. And in that time to come your heart will be a flame within you, my Rosamund, an ever insatiable flame! And in that time to come you will hate your God because He made you, and you will hate Satan because in a desperate hour he tricked you, and you will hate all men because they scurry to obey your whims. But chiefly you will hate yourself because you are so pitiable: and devastation only will you love in that strange time which is to come. It is adjacent, my Rosamund."

The girl kept silence. She sat erect in the tumbled bed, her hands clasping her knees, and she appeared to deliberate what Dame Ysabeau had said. Plentiful brown hair fell about this Rosamund's face, which was white and shrewd.

"A part of what you say, madame, I understand. I know that Gregory Darrell loves me, yet I have long ago acknowledged that he loves me as one pets a child, or, let us say, a spaniel which reveres and amuses its master. I lack his wit, you comprehend, and so he never speaks to me all that he thinks. Yet a part of it he tells me, and he loves me, and with this I am content. Assuredly, if they give me to Sarum I shall hate Sarum even more than I detest him now. And then, I think, Heaven help me! that I would not very greatly grieve — But you are all evil!"

Rosamund said; "and you thrust into my mind thoughts which I may not understand! "

"You will comprehend them," the Queen said, "when you know yourself a chattel, bought and paid for, with Heaven very resolutely denying you that help which other quarters proffer."

The Queen laughed. She rose, and her hands strained toward heaven. "You are omnipotent, yet have You let me become that into which I am changed! "

She began to speak as though a statue spoke through lips that seemed motionless. "Men have long urged me, Rosamund, to a deed which by one stroke would make me mistress of these islands. To-day I looked on Gregory Darrell, and knew that I was wise in love, — and I had but to crush a lewd, soft worm to come to him. Eh, and I was tempted — ! "

The girl said: "Let us grant that Gregory loves you very greatly, and me just when his leisure serves. You may offer him a cushioned infamy, a colorful and brief delirium, and afterward demolishment of soul and body. I offer him contentment and a level life, made up of small events, it may be, and lacking both in abysses and in skyey heights. Yet is love a flame wherein the lover's soul must be purified; it is a flame which assays high queens just as it does their servants: and thus, madame, to judge between us I dare summon you."

"Child, child!" the Queen said, tenderly, and with a smile, "you are brave; and in your fashion you are wise: yet you will never comprehend. But once I was in heart and soul and body all that you are to-day; and now I am Queen Ysabeau — Did you in truth hear nothing, Rosamund?"

"Why, nothing save the wind."

"That is a strange thing. For all the while that I have talked with you I have been seriously annoyed by shrieks and a man's pitiable wailing. But I, too, grow cowardly, it may be — Yet I know that by this time I am mistress of broad England, until my son — my own son, born of my body, and in glad anguish, Rosamund, — knows me for what I am. For I have heard shrieks and a man's pitiable long wailing, as, with red irons, others played that game in which he once delighted."

"Madame Ysabeau — !" the girl answered vaguely, for she was puzzled and was almost frightened by the other's strange talk.

"So let us now get back to bed!" said Ysabeau; "and let us put out the lights lest he come presently. Or perhaps he fears me, now, too much to come to-night. Yet the night approaches, none the less, when I shall lift some arras, or it may be I shall unclose some door, to find him there, in the dark, within arm's reach, chalk-white, with painted cheeks, and smiling very terribly, — or perhaps I shall look into some mirror and behold there not myself but him, — and in that instant I shall die. Meantime I rule, until my son attains his manhood. Eh, Rosamund, my only son was once so tiny, and so helpless, and his little crimson mouth groped toward me, helplessly, and save in Bethlehem, I thought, there was never any child more fair — But I must forget all that, for even now my son plots against me. God orders matters very shrewdly, my Rosamund."

Timidly the girl touched Ysabeau's shoulder. "In part, I understand, madame and Queen."

"You understand nothing," said Ysabeau. "How should you understand, whose breasts are yet so tiny? So let us put out the light! though I dread darkness. They say that hell is very poorly lighted. God has thought of that also."

Then Queen Ysabeau shrugged. Pensively she blew out each lamp.

"We know this Gregory Darrell," the Queen said in the darkness, "ah, to the marrow we know him, howsoever steadfastly we blink, and we know the present turmoil of his soul. And in common-sense what chance have you of retaining this handsome weakling?"

"None in common-sense, madame; and yet you go too fast. For man is a being of mingled nature, we are told by those in holy orders, and his life here is an unending warfare between that which is divine in him and that which is frail and bestial, while impartial Heaven attends as arbiter of the tourney. Always a man's judgment misleads him, and his faculties allure him to a truce, howsoever brief, with iniquity. His senses raise a mist about his goings, and there is not an endowment of the man but in the end plays traitor to his interest, as of God's wisdom God intends: so that when the man is overthrown, the Eternal Father may, in reason, be neither vexed nor grieved if only the man takes heart to rise again. And when, betrayed and impotent, the man elects to fight out the allotted battle, defiant of common-sense and of the counsellors which God Himself accorded, I think that the Saints hold festival in heaven."

"An excellent sermon!" said the Queen. "Yet I do not think that our Gregory could very long endure a wife given over to any such high-minded talking. He prefers to hear himself do the fine talking."

There followed a long silence, disturbed only by purposeless September winds; but I believe that neither of these two women slept with profundity.

About dawn one of the Queen's attendants roused Sir Gregory Darrell and conducted him into the hedged garden of Ordish, where Ysabeau walked in tranquil converse with Lord Berners. The old man was in high good humor.

"My lad," said he, and he clapped Sir Gregory upon the shoulder, "you have, I do protest, the very phœnix of sisters. I was never happier."

Then Lord Berners went away chuckling.

The Queen said, "We ride for Blackfriars now."

Darrell responded, "I am content, but I ask leave to speak, howsoever briefly, with Dame Rosamund before I die."

Then the woman came more near to him. "I am not used to beg, but within this hour you encounter death, and I have loved no man in all my life saving only you, Gregory Darrell. Nor have you loved any person as you loved me once in France. Oh, to-day, I may speak freely, for with you the doings of that boy and girl are matters overpast. Yet were it otherwise — eh, do you weigh this matter carefully! for I am mistress of England now, and England would I give you, and such love as that slim, white innocence has never dreamed of would I give you, Gregory Darrell — "

Then the Queen clapped one hand upon his lips.

She very quickly said: "I spoke to tempt you. But you saw, and you saw clearly, that it was the sickly whim of a wanton, and you did not think of yielding, for you love this Rosamund Eastney, and you know me to be vile. Then, have a care of me! The strange woman am I, of whom we read that her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death. Hoh, many strong men have been slain by me, and in the gray time to come will many others be slain by me, it may be; but never you among them, my Gregory, who are more wary, and more merciful, and who know that I have need to lay aside at least one comfortable thought against eternity."

"I concede you to have been unwise —" he hoarsely began.

About them fell the dying leaves, of many glorious colors, but the air of this new day seemed raw and chill.

Then Rosamund came through the opening in the hedge. "Now, do you choose," she said. "The woman offers life and high place and wealth, and, it may be, a greater love than I am capable of giving you. I offer a dishonorable death within the moment."

And again, with that peculiar and imperious gesture, the man flung back his head, and he laughed. Said Gregory Darrell:

"I am I! and I will so to live that I may face without shame not only God, but also my own scrutiny."

He wheeled upon the Queen, and he spoke henceforward very leisurely.

"I love you; all my life long I am condemned to love you, Ysabeau, no matter what I may prefer: and you, too, dear Rosamund, I love, with a great difference. And I desire the power that you would give me, Ysabeau, and I desire the good which I would do with that power in the England which I or blustering Roger Mortimer must rule, through edicts issued from your bedchamber; and I desire also to be the man that I would be if I were able now to choose death without any debate."

Then Gregory Darrell said: "And I think of the man that you would make of me, my Rosamund. . . . The man! And what is this man, this Gregory Darrell, that his welfare should be considered? — an ape who chatters to himself of kinship with the archangels while filthily he digs for groundnuts! This much I know, at bottom. . . . Yet more clearly do I perceive that this same man, like all his fellows, is a maimed god who walks the world dependent upon many wise and evil counsellors. He must measure, to a hair's-breadth, every content of the world by means of a bloodied sponge, tucked somewhere in his skull, a sponge which is ungeared by the first cup of wine and ruined by the touch of his own finger. He must appraise all that he judges with no better instruments than two bits of colored jelly, with a bungling makeshift so fallible that the nearest horologer's apprentice could have devised a more accurate device. In fine, each man is under penalty condemned to compute eternity with false weights, to estimate infinity with a yardstick: and he very often does it. Thereafter, to defend these computations, he chooses his own death without any debate."

And Gregory Darrell said also: "For, though, 'If then I do that which I would not I consent unto the law,' saith even an Apostle; yet a braver pagan answers him, 'Perceive at last that thou hast in thee something better and more divine than the things which cause the various effects and, as it were, pull thee by the strings.' There lies the choice which every man must face, — whether rationally, as his reason goes, to accept his own limitations and make the best of his allotted prison yard? or stupendously to play the fool and swear even to himself (while his own judgment shrieks and proves a flat denial), that he is at will omnipotent? and that he, who is divinely born, has in this prison yard to uphold his Father's private honor. Well, you have chosen long ago, my poor proud Ysabeau; and I choose now, and differently: for poltroon that I am! being now in a cold drench of terror, I steadfastly protest I am not very much afraid, and I choose death without any more debate."

It was toward Rosamund that the Queen looked. "Should Queen Ysabeau be angry or vexed or very cruel now, my Rosamund? for at bottom she is glad."

And the Queen said also: "I give you back your plighted word. I ride homeward to my husks, but you remain. Or, rather, the Countess of Farrington departs for the convent of Ambresbury, disconsolate in her widowhood and desirous to have done with worldly affairs. It is most natural she should relinquish to her beloved and only brother all her dower-lands, — or so at least Messire de Berners acknowledges. Here, then, is the grant, my Gregory, that conveys to you those lands of Ralph de Belomys' which last year I confiscated. And this tedious Messire de Berners is now eager to have you for a son-in-law."

About them fell the dying leaves, of many glorious colors, but the air of this new day seemed raw and chill, in the while that Dame Ysabeau took Sir Gregory's hand and laid it upon the hand of Rosamund Eastney. "Our paladin is, in the outcome, a mortal man, and therefore I do not altogether envy you. Yet he has his moments, and you are capable. Serve, then, not only his desires but mine also, dear Rosamund!"

There was a silence. The girl spoke as though her answer were a sacrament. "I will do that, madame and Queen."

Thus did the Queen end her holiday.

A little later the Countess of Farrington rode from Ordish with all her train save one; and riding from that place, where love was, she sang very softly.

Sang Ysabeau:

"As with her dupes dealt Circe
Life deals with hers, for she Reshapes them without mercy,
And shapes them swinishly,
To wallow swinishly,
And for eternity;

"Though, harder than the witch was,
Life, changing not the whole,
Transmutes the body, which was Proud garment of the soul,
And briefly drugs the soul,
Whose ruin is her goal;

" And means by this thereafter
A subtler mirth to get,
And mock with bitterer laughter
Her helpless dupes' regret,
Their swinish dull regret
For what they half forget."

And within the hour came Hubert Frayne to Ordish, riding on a foam-specked horse, as he went about those parts to announce to the King's men the King's barbaric murder overnight, at Berkeley Castle, by Queen Ysabeau's order.

" Ride southward," said Lord Berners, and he panted as they buckled on his disused armor; " but harkee, Frayne! if you pass the Countess of Farrington's company, do you speak no syllable of this news! It is not convenient that a lady so thoroughly and so praiseworthily intent upon holy matters — but, Lord, how I have fattened! — No, it is not right that this dear lady should have her salutary meditations disturbed by any such unsettling tidings. Hey, son-in-law? "

Sir Gregory Darrell laughed, very bitterly. " He that is without blemish among you — " he said.

Then they armed completely, and went forth to battle against the murderous harlot.

The Fifth Novel. — Philippa of Hainault dares to love unthriftily, and with the prodigality of her affection shames treachery, and common-sense, and high romance, quite stolidly; but, as loving goes, is overtopped by her more stolid squire.

The Story of the Housewife

IN the year of grace 1326, upon Walburga's Eve, some three hours after sunset (thus Nicolas begins), had you visited a certain garden on the outskirts of Valenciennes, you might there have stumbled upon a big, handsome boy, prone on the turf, where by turns he groaned and vented himself in sullen curses. His profanity had its palliation. Heir to England though he was, you must know that this boy's father in the flesh had hounded him from England, as more recently had the lad's uncle Charles the Handsome driven him from France.

Now had this boy and his mother (the same Queen Ysabeau about whom I have told you in the preceding tale) come as suppliants to the court of that stalwart nobleman Sire William (Count of Hainault, Holland, and Zealand, and Lord of Friesland), where their arrival had evoked the suggestion that they depart at their earliest convenience. To-morrow, then, these footsore royalties, the Queen of England and the Prince of Wales, would be thrust out-of-doors to resume their weary beggarship in the various courts of Europe. For they could get help nowhere. No monarch had anything tangible to gain by meddling in the war between King Edward and Queen Ysabeau, in which the king had, just now, the better: whereas, upon moral grounds, no monarch could possibly have decided which one of this sorry pair was the less worthy of assistance.

So the young son of this pair aspersed his destiny. And near to him a nightingale caroled as though an exiled prince were the blithest spectacle the moon knew.

Then came through the garden a tall girl, running, stumbling in her haste. "Hail, King of England!" she said.

"Do not mock me, Philippa!" the boy answered, with some three-quarters of a sob; and sulkily he rose to his feet.

"No mockery here, my fair sweet friend! No, I have told my father all which happened yesterday. I pleaded for you. He questioned me very closely. And when I had ended, he stroked his beard, and presently struck one hand upon the table. 'Out of the mouth of babes!' he said. Then he said: 'My dear, I believe for certain that this lady and her son have been driven from their kingdom wrongfully. If it be for the good of God to comfort the afflicted, how much more is it commendable to help and succor one who is the daughter of a king, descended from royal lineage, and to whose blood we ourselves are related!' And accordingly he and your mother have their heads together yonder, planning an invasion of England, no less, and the dethronement of your wicked father, my Edward. And accordingly, — hail, King of England! "

The girl clapped her hands gleefully. The nightingale sang.

But the boy kept momentary silence. Not even in youth were the men of his race handicapped by excessively tender hearts; yesterday in the shrubbery the boy had kissed this daughter of Count William, in part because she was a healthy and handsome person, and partly because great benefit might come of an alliance with her father. Well! the Prince had found chance-taking not unfortunate. With the episode as foundation Count William had already builded up the future queenship of England. The Count intended that the next Queen of England should be his own daughter, so soon as the Count had aided the present Queen to overthrow and destroy her husband. . . .

For Count William had now a moral interest in this affair. It was his very plain duty to protect his own daughter's rights by serving his son-in-law: and the exiled Prince, who but one moment ago had been a landless pauper, could now foresee himself — with this rather fat girl's love as ladder, — mounting to the high habitations of the King of England, the Lord of Ireland, and the Duke of Aquitaine. Thus they would herald him, the very minute he could get his father killed. Well, but Mother would attend to that, of course. . . .

So he embraced the girl. "Hail, Queen of England!" said the Prince; and then, "If I forget —" His voice broke awkwardly. "My dear, if ever I forget — !"

Their lips met now. The nightingale discoursed as if on a wager.

Presently was mingled with the bird's descant another kind of singing. Beyond the yew hedge as these two stood silent, breast to breast, passed young Jehan Kuypelant, one of the pages, fitting to the accompaniment of a lute his paraphrase of the song which Archilochus of Sicyon very anciently made in honor of Venus Melænis, the tender Venus of the Dark.

At a gap in the hedge the young Brabanter paused. His singing ended. These two, who stood heart hammering against heart, saw for an instant Jehan Kuypelant's lean face silvered by the moonlight, his mouth a tiny abyss. Followed the beat of lessening footfalls, while the nightingale improvised an envoi.

But earlier Jehan Kuypelant also had sung, as though in rivalry with the bird.

Sang Jehan Kuypelant:

"Hearken and heed, Melænis!
For all that the litany ceased
When time had pilfered the victim,
And flouted thy pale-lipped priest,
And set astir in the temple
Where burned the fires of thy shrine

The owls and wolves of the desert —
Yet hearken, (the issue is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine!

" For I have followed, nor faltered —
Adrift in a land of dreams
Where laughter and pity and terror
Commingle as confluent streams,
I have seen and adored the Sidonian,
Implacable, fair and divine, —
And bending low, have implored thee
To hearken, (the issue is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine! "

It is time, however, that we quit this subject and speak of other matters. Just twenty years later, on one August day in the year of grace 1346, Master John Copeland — as men now called Jehan Kuypelant, now secretary to the Queen of England, — brought his mistress the unhandsome tidings that David Bruce had invaded her realm with forty thousand Scots to back him. The Brabanter found plump Queen Philippa with the kingdom's arbitress, — Dame Catherine of Salisbury, whom King Edward, third of that name to reign in Britain, and now warring in France, very notoriously adored and obeyed.

This king, indeed, had been despatched into France chiefly, they narrate, to release the Countess' husband, William de Montacute, from the French prison of the Châtelet. You may appraise her dominion by this fact: chaste and shrewd, she had denied all to King Edward, and in consequence he could deny her nothing; so she sent him to fetch back her husband, whom she almost loved. That armament had sailed from Southampton on Saint George's day.

These two women, then, shared the Brabanter's execrable news. Already Northumberland, Westmorland, and Durham were the broken meats of King David.

The Countess presently exclaimed: "Let them weep for this that must! My place is not here."

Philippa said, half hopefully, "Do you forsake Lord Edward, Catherine?"

"Madame and Queen," the Countess answered, "in this world every man must scratch his own back. My lord has entrusted to me his castle of Wark, his fiefs in Northumberland. These, I hear, are being laid waste. Were there a thousand men-at-arms left in England I would say fight. As it is, our men are yonder in France and the island is defenseless. Accordingly, I ride for the north to make what terms I may with the King of Scots."

Now you might have seen the Queen's eyes brighten. "Undoubtedly," said she, "in her lord's absence it is the wife's part to defend his belongings. And my lord's fief is England. I bid you Godspeed, Catherine." And when the Countess was gone, Philippa turned, her round face somewhat dazed and flushed. "She betrays him! she compounds with the Scot! Mother of Christ, let me not fail!"

"A ship must be despatched to bid Lord Edward return," said the secretary. "Otherwise, all England is lost."

"Not so, John Copeland! We must let Lord Edward complete his overrunning of France, if such be the Trinity's will. You know perfectly well that he has always had a fancy to conquer France; and if I bade him return now he would be vexed."

"The disappointment of the King," John Copeland considered, "is a smaller evil than allowing all of us to be butchered."

"Not to me, John Copeland," the Queen said.

Now came many lords into the chamber, seeking Madame Philippa. "We must make peace with the Scottish rascal!" — "England is lost!" — "A ship must be sent entreating succor of Lord Edward!" So they shouted.

"Messieurs," said Queen Philippa, "who commands here? Am I, then, some woman of the town?"

That procured silence. John Copeland, standing by the seaward window, had picked up a lute and was fingering the instrument half idly. The Queen noted that.

Now the Marquess of Hastings stepped from the throng. "Pardon, Highness. But the occasion is urgent."

"The occasion is very urgent, my lord," the Queen assented, deep in meditation.

John Copeland flung back his head and without prelude began to carol lustily.

Sang John Copeland:

"There are taller lads than Atys,
And many are wiser than he, — How should I heed them? — whose fate is Ever to serve and to be Ever the lover of Atys,
And die that Atys may dine,
Live if he need me — Then heed me,
And speed me, (the moment is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine!

"Fair is the form unbeholden,
And golden the glory of thee
Whose voice is the voice of a vision
Whose face is the foam of the sea,
And the fall of whose feet is the flutter
Of breezes in birches and pine,
When thou drawest near me, to hear me,
And cheer me, (the moment is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine!"

I must tell you that the Queen shivered, as if with extreme cold. She gazed toward John Copeland won-deringly. The secretary was fretting at his lute strings, with his head down, so that she could not see his face. Then in a while the Queen turned to Hastings.

"The occasion is very urgent, my lord," the Queen once more assented. "Therefore it is my will that to-morrow one and all your men be mustered at Blackheath. We will take the field without delay against the King of Scots."

The riot began anew. "Madness!" they shouted; "lunar madness! We can do nothing until our King returns with our army!"

"In his absence," the Queen said, "I command here."

"You are not Regent," the Marquess answered. Then he cried, "This is the Regent's affair!"

"Let the Regent be fetched," Dame Philippa said, very quietly.

They brought in her son, Messire Lionel, now a boy of eight years, and, in the King's absence, Regent of England.

Both the Queen and the Marquess held papers. "Highness," Lord Hastings began, "for reasons of state which I lack time to explain, this document requires your signature. It is an order that a ship be despatched to ask the King's return. Your Highness may remember the pony you admired yesterday?" The Marquess smiled ingratiatingly. "Just here, your highness, — a cross mark."

"The dappled one?" said the Regent; "and all for making a little mark?"

The boy jumped for the pen.

"Lionel," said the Queen, "you are Regent of England, but you are also my son. If you sign that paper you will beyond doubt get the pony, but you will not, I think, care to ride him. You will not care to sit down at all, Lionel."

The Regent considered. "Thank you very much, my lord," he said in the ultimate, "but I do not like ponies any more. Do I sign here, Mother?"

Philippa handed the Marquess a subscribed order to muster the English forces at Blackheath; then another, closing the English ports. "My lords," the Queen said, "this boy is the King's vicar. In defying him, you defy the King. Yes, Lionel, you have fairly earned a pot of jam for supper."

Then Hastings went away without speaking. That night assembled at his lodgings, by appointment, Viscount Heringaud, Adam Frere, the Marquess of Orme, Lord Stourton, the Earls of Neville and Gage, and Sir Thomas Rokeby. These seven found a long table there littered with pens and parchment; to the rear of it, with a lackey behind him, sat the Marquess of Hastings, meditative over a cup of Bordeaux.

Presently Hastings said: "My friends, in creating our womankind the Maker of us all was beyond doubt actuated by laudable and cogent reasons; so that I can merely lament my inability to fathom these reasons. I shall obey the Queen faithfully, since if I did otherwise Lord Edward would have my head off within a day of his return. In consequence, I do not consider it convenient to oppose his vicar. To-morrow I shall assemble the tatters of troops which remain to us, and to-morrow we march northward to inevitable defeat. To-night I am sending a courier into Northumberland. He is an obliging person, and would convey — to cite an instance, — eight letters quite as blithely as one."

Each man glanced furtively about. England was in a panic by this time, well knowing that entire England lay before the Bruce defenseless. The all-powerful Countess of Salisbury had compounded with King David; now Hastings, too, their generalissimo, compounded. What the devil! loyalty was a sonorous word, and so was patriotism, but, after all, one had estates in the north.

The seven wrote in silence. I must tell you that when they had ended, Hastings gathered the letters into a heap, and without glancing at the superscriptions, handed all these letters to the attendant lackey.

"For the courier," said Hastings.

The fellow left the apartment. Presently you heard a departing clatter of hoofs, and Hastings rose. He was a gaunt, terrible old man, gray-bearded, and having high eyebrows that twitched and jerked.

"We have saved our precious skins," said he. "Hey, you fidgeters, you ferments of sour offal! I commend your common-sense, messieurs, and I request you to withdraw. Even a damned rogue such as I has need of a cleaner atmosphere in order to breathe comfortably."

The seven went away without further speech.

They narrate that next day the troops marched for Durham, where the Queen took up her quarters. The Bruce had pillaged and burned his way to a place called Beaurepair, within three miles of the city. He sent word to the Queen that if her men were willing to come forth from the town he would abide and give them battle.

She replied that she accepted his offer, and that the barons would gladly risk their lives for the realm of their lord the King. The Bruce grinned and kept silence, since he had in his pocket letters from most of them protesting they would do nothing of the sort.

Here is comedy. On one side you have a horde of half-naked savages, a shrewd master holding them in leash till the moment be auspicious; on the other side, a housewife at the head of a tiny force lieutenanted by perjurers, by men already purchased. God knows what dreams she had of miraculous victories, while her barons trafficked in secret with the Bruce. It is recorded that, on the Saturday before Michaelmas, when the opposing armies marshaled in the Bishop's Park, at Auckland, not a captain on either side believed the day to be pregnant with battle. There would be a decent counterfeit of resistance; afterward the little English army would vanish pell-mell, and the Bruce would be master of the island. The farce was prearranged, the actors therein were letter-perfect.

That morning at daybreak John Copeland came to the Queen's tent, and informed her quite explicitly how matters stood. He had been drinking overnight with Adam Frere and the Earl of Gage, and after the third bottle had found them candid.

"Madame and Queen, we are betrayed. The Marquess of Hastings, our commander, is inexplicably smitten with a fever. He will not fight to-day. Not one of your lords will fight to-day." Master Copeland laid bare such part of the scheme as yesterday's conviviality had made familiar. "Therefore I counsel retreat. Let the King be summoned out of France."

Queen Philippa shook her head, as she cut up squares of toast and dipped them in milk for the Regent's breakfast. "Lord Edward would be vexed. He has always wanted to conquer France. I shall visit the Marquess as soon as Lionel is fed, — do you know, John Copeland, I am anxious about Lionel; he is irritable and coughed five times during the night, — and then I will attend to this affair."

She found the Marquess in bed, groaning, the coverlet pulled up to his chin. "Pardon, highness," said Lord Hastings, "but I am an ill man. I cannot rise from this couch."

"I do not question the gravity of your disorder," the Queen retorted, "since it is well known that the same illness brought about the death of Iscariot. Nevertheless, I bid you get up and lead our troops against the Scot."

Now the hand of the Marquess veiled his countenance. "I am an ill man," he muttered, doggedly. "I cannot rise from this couch."

There was a silence.

"My lord," the Queen presently began, "without is an army prepared — yes, and quite able, — to defend our England. The one requirement of this army is a leader. Afford them that, my lord, — ah, I know that our peers are sold to the Bruce, yet our yeomen at least are honest. Give them, then, a leader, and they cannot but conquer, since God also is honest and incorruptible. Pardieu! a woman might lead these men, and lead them to victory!"

Hastings answered: "I am ill. I cannot rise from this couch."

"There is no man left in England," said the Queen, "since Lord Edward went into France. Praise God, I am his wife!"

She went away without flurry.

Through the tent flap Hastings beheld all that which followed. The English force was marshaled in four divisions, each commanded by a bishop and a baron. You could see the men fidgeting, puzzled by the delay: as a wind goes about a cornfield, vague rumors were going about those wavering spears. Toward them rode Philippa, upon a white palfrey, alone and perfectly tranquil. Her eight lieutenants were now gathered about her in voluble protestation, and she heard them out. Afterward she spoke, without any particular violence, as one might order a strange cur from his room. Then the Queen rode on, as though these eight declaiming persons had ceased to be of interest. She reigned up before her standard bearer, and took the standard in her hand. She began again to speak, and immediately the army was in an uproar; the barons were clustering behind her, in stealthy groups of two or three whisperers each; all were in the greatest amazement and knew not what next to do: but the army was shouting the Queen's name.

"Now is England shamed," said Hastings, "since a woman alone dares to encounter the Scot. She will lead them into battle, — and by God! there is no braver person under heaven than yonder Dutch Frau! Friend David, I perceive that your venture is lost, for those men would follow her to storm hell if she desired it."

He meditated, and shrugged. "And so would I," said Hastings.

A little afterward a gaunt and haggard old man, bareheaded and very hastily dressed, reined his horse by the Queen's side. "Madame and Queen," said Hastings, "I rejoice that my recent illness is departed. I shall, by God's grace, on this day drive the Bruce from England."

Philippa was not given to verbiage. Doubtless she had her emotions, but her stolid, healthily colored face displayed none of them. She rested one plump hand upon the big-veined hand of Hastings. That was all.

"I welcome back the gallant gentleman of yesterday. I was about to lead your army, my friend, since there was no one else to do it, but I was hideously afraid. At bottom every woman is a coward."

"You were afraid to do it," said the Marquess, "but you were going to do it, because there was no one else to do it! Ho, madame! had I an army of such cowards I would drive the Scot not past the Border but beyond the Orkneys."

The Queen then said, "But you are unarmed."

"Highness," he replied, "it is surely apparent that I, who have played the traitor to two monarchs within the same day, cannot with either decency or comfort survive that day." He turned upon the lords and bishops twittering about his horse's tail. "You merchandise, get back to your stations! and if there was ever an honest woman in any of your families, the which I doubt, do you contrive to get yourselves killed this day, in the cause of the honestest and bravest woman our time has known!"

Immediately the English forces marched toward Merrington.

Philippa returned to her pavilion and inquired for John Copeland. She was informed that he had ridden off, armed, in company with five of her immediate retainers. She considered this strange, but made no comment.

You picture her, perhaps, as spending the morning in prayer, in beatings upon her breast, and in lamentations. Philippa did nothing of the sort. She considered her cause to be so clamantly just that to expatiate to the Holy Father upon its merits would be an impertinence; it was not conceivable that He would fail her; and, in any event, she had in hand a great deal of sewing which required immediate attention. Accordingly, she settled down to her needlework, while the Regent of England leaned his head against her knee, and his mother told him that ageless tale of Lord Huon, who in a wood near Babylon encountered the King of Faëry, and subsequently bereaved an atrocious Emir of his beard and daughter. All this the industrious woman narrated in a low and pleasant voice, while the wide-eyed Regent attended, and at the proper intervals gulped his cough mixture.

You must know that about noon Master John Copeland came into the tent. "We have conquered," he said. "Now, by the Face!" — thus, scoffingly, he used her husband's favorite oath, — "now, by the Face! there was never a victory more complete! The Scottish army is fled, it is as utterly dispersed from man's seeing as are the sands which dried the letters King Ahasuerus gave the admirable Esther!"

"I rejoice," the Queen said, looking up from her sewing, "that we have conquered, though in nature I expected nothing else — Oh, horrible!"

She sprang to her feet with a cry of anguish. Here, in little, you have the entire woman; the victory of her armament was to her a thing of course, since her cause was just, whereas the loss of two front teeth by John Copeland was a calamity.

He drew her toward the tent flap, which he opened. Without was a mounted knight, in full panoply, his arms bound behind him, surrounded by the Queen's five retainers.

"In the rout I took him," said John Copeland; "though, as my mouth witnesses, I did not find this David Bruce a tractable prisoner."

"Is that, then, the King of Scots?" Philippa demanded, as she mixed salt and water for a mouth wash. "Lord Edward should be pleased, I think. Will he not love me a little now, John Copeland?"

John Copeland lifted both plump hands toward his disfigured lips. "He could not choose," John Copeland said; "madame, he could no more choose but love you than I could choose."

Philippa sighed. Afterward she bade John Copeland rinse his gums and then take his prisoner to Hastings. He told her the Marquess was dead, slain by the Knight of Liddesdale.

"That is a pity," the Queen said. She reflected a while, reached her decision. "There is left alive in England but one man to whom I dare entrust the keeping of the King of Scots. My barons are sold to him; if I retain Messire David by me, one or another of these traitors will engineer his escape within the week, and Lord Edward will be vexed. Yet listen, John — "

She unfolded her plan.

"I have long known," he said, when she had done, "that in all the world there was no lady more lovable. Twenty years I have loved you, my Queen, and yet it is only to-day I perceive that in all the world there is no lady more wise than you."

Philippa touched his cheek, maternally. "Foolish boy! You tell me the King of Scots has an arrow wound in his nose? I think a bread poultice would be best."

She told him how to make this poultice, and gave other instructions. Then John Copeland left the tent and presently rode away with his company.

Philippa saw that the Regent had his dinner, and afterward mounted her white palfrey and set out for the battlefield. There the Earl of Neville, as second in command, received her with great courtesy. God had shown to her Majesty's servants most singular favor: despite the calculations of reasonable men, — to which, she might remember, he had that morning taken the liberty to assent, — some fifteen thousand Scots were slain. True, her gallant general was no longer extant, though this was scarcely astounding when one considered the fact that he had voluntarily entered the mêlée quite unarmed. A touch of age perhaps; Hastings was always an eccentric man: in any event, as epilogue, this Neville congratulated the Queen that — by blind luck he was forced to concede, — her worthy secretary had made a prisoner of the Scottish King. Doubtless, Master Copeland was an estimable scribe, and yet — Ah, yes, Lord Neville quite followed her Majesty, — beyond doubt, the wardage of a king was an honor not lightly to be conferred. Oh, yes, he understood; her Majesty desired that the office should be given to some person of more suitable estate. And pardie! her Majesty was in the right. Eh? said the Earl of Neville.

Stolidly gazing into the man's shallow eyes, Philippa assented. Women, she admitted, were ignorant in such matters. She appreciated Lord Neville's friendliness. It would be remembered. She clucked now rather like a hen in disapprobation. Master Copeland had acted unwarrantably in riding off with his captive. Let him be sought at once.

She dictated to Neville's secretary a letter, which informed John Copeland that he had done what was not agreeable in purloining her prisoner. Let him without delay deliver the King to her good friend the Earl of Neville.

To Neville this was satisfactory, since he intended that, once in his possession, David Bruce should escape forthwith. The letter, I repeat, suited this smirking gentleman in its tiniest syllable, and the single difficulty was to convey it to John Copeland, for as to his whereabouts neither Neville nor anyone else had the least notion.

This was immaterial, however, for they narrate that next day a letter signed with John Copeland's name was found pinned to the front of Neville's tent. I cite a passage therefrom: "I will not give up my royal prisoner to a woman or a child, but only to my own lord, Lord Edward, for to him I have sworn allegiance, and not to any woman. Yet you may tell the Queen she can depend on my taking excellent care of King David. I have poulticed his nose, as she directed."

Here was a nonplus, not without its comical side. Two great realms had met in battle, and the king of one of them had vanished like a soap bubble. Philippa was in a rage, — you could see that both by her demeanor and by the indignant letters she dictated: it was true none of these letters could be delivered, since they were all addressed to John Copeland. Meanwhile, Scotland was in despair, whereas the traitor English barons were in a frenzy, because they did not know what had become of their fatal letters to the Bruce, or of him either. The circumstances were unique, and they remained unchanged for three feverish weeks, during which time Philippa retired to York Castle and put up her preserves for the winter.

We will now return to affairs in France, where on the day of the Nativity, as night gathered about Calais, John Copeland came unheralded to the quarters of King Edward, then besieging that city. Master Copeland entreated audience, and got it readily enough, since there was no man alive whom Lord Edward more cordially desired to lay his fingers upon.

A page brought Master Copeland to the King, that stupendous, blond and incredibly big person. With Lord Edward were that careful Italian, Almerigo di Pavia, who afterward betrayed Lord Edward, and an elderly lean soldier whom Master Copeland recognized as John Chandos. These three were drawing up an account of the recent victory at Créci, to be forwarded to all mayors and sheriffs in England, with a cogent postscript as to the King's incidental and immediate need of money.

Now King Edward sat leaning far back in his chair, a hand on each hip, and with his eyes narrowing as he regarded Master Copeland. Had the Brabanter flinched, the King would probably have hanged him within the next ten minutes; finding his gaze unwavering, the King was pleased. Here was a novelty; most people blinked quite honestly under the scrutiny of those fierce big eyes, which were blue and cold and of an astounding luster. The lid of the left eye drooped a little: this was Count Manuel's legacy, they whispered.

The King rose with a jerk, and he took John Copeland's hand. "Ha!" Lord Edward grunted, "I welcome the squire who by his valor has captured the King of Scots. And now, my man, what have you done with Davie?"

John Copeland answered: "Highness, you may find him at your convenience safely locked in Bamborough Castle. Meanwhile, I entreat you, sire, do not take it amiss if I did not surrender King David to the orders of my lady Queen, for I hold my lands of you, and not of her, and my oath is to you, and not to her, unless, indeed, by choice."

"John," the King sternly replied, "the loyal service you have done us is considerable, whereas your excuse for kidnaping Davie is a farce. Hey, Almerigo, do you and Chandos avoid the chamber! I have something in private with this fellow." When they had gone, the King sat down and said, "Now then do you dismiss this sudden new fealty to me, and tell the truth!"

"Sire," Copeland began, "it is necessary you first understand I bear a letter from Madame Philippa —"

"Then read it!" said the King. "Heart of God! have I an eternity to waste on you slow-dealing Brabanters!"

John Copeland read aloud, while the King trifled with a pen, half negligent, and in part attendant.

Read John Copeland:

"My Dear Lord,—I recommend me to your lordship with soul and body and all my poor might, and with all this I thank you, as my dear lord, dearest and best beloved of all earthly lords I protest to me, and I thank you, my dear lord, with all this, as I say before. Your comfortable letter came to me on Saint Gregory's day, and I was never so glad as when I heard by your letter that you were strong enough in Ponthieu, by the grace of God, to overcome your enemies and evil-wishers. Among them I estimate Madame Catherine de Salisbury, who would have betrayed you to the Scot. And, dear lord, if it be pleasing to your high lordship that very soon I may hear of your gracious speed, which may God Almighty continue and increase, I shall be glad, and also if you do continue each night to chafe your feet with a rag of woolen stuff, anointed as your physician directed. And, my dear lord, John Copeland will acquaint you concerning the Bruce his capture, and the sirup he brings for our fair son Edward's cough, and the great malice-workers in these shires which would have so despitefully wrought to you, and of the manner of taking it after each meal. I am lately informed that Madame Catherine is now at Stirling with Robert Stewart and has lost all her good looks through a fever. God is invariably gracious to His servants. Farewell, my dear lord, and may the Holy Trinity keep you from your adversaries and ever send me comfortable tidings of you. Written at York, in the Castle, on Saint Gregory's day last past, by your own poor

"PHILIPPA

"To my true lord."

"H'm!" said the King; "and now give me the entire story!"

John Copeland obeyed. I must tell you that early in the narrative King Edward arose and strode toward a window. "Catherine!" he said. He remained motionless while Master Copeland went on without any manifest emotion. When John Copeland had ended, Lord Edward said, "And where is Madame de Salisbury now?"

At this, the Brabanter went mad. As a leopard springs he leaped upon the King, and grasping him by each shoulder, shook that monarch like one punishing a child.

"Now, by the splendor of God — !" King Edward began, very terrible in his wrath. He saw that John Copeland held a dagger to his breast, and he shrugged. "Well, my man, you perceive I am defenseless."

"First, you will hear me out," John Copeland said.

"It would appear," the King retorted, "that I have little choice."

At this time John Copeland began: "Sire, you are the mightiest monarch your race has known. England is yours, France is yours, conquered Scotland lies prostrate at your feet. To-day there is no other man in all the world who possesses a tithe of your glory; yet twenty years ago Madame Philippa first beheld you and loved you, an outcast, an exiled, empty-pocketed prince. Twenty years ago the love of Madame Philippa, great Count William's daughter, got for you the armament with which England was regained. Twenty years ago, sire, but for the fond stupidity of Madame Philippa you would have died naked in some ditch."

"Go on!" the King said, presently.

"Afterward you took a fancy to reign in France. You learned then that we Brabanters are a frugal people: Madame Philippa was wealthy when she married you, and twenty years had quadrupled her private fortune. She gave you every penny of it that you might fit out this expedition; now her very crown is in pawn at Ghent. In fine, the love of Madame Philippa, which gave you England, now gave you France as lightly as one might bestow a toy upon a child who whined for it."

The King fiercely said, "Go on!"

"Eh, sire, I intend to! You left England undefended, so that you might posture a little in the eyes of Europe. And meanwhile a woman preserves England, a woman now gives you Scotland also as a gift, and in return asks nothing — God have mercy on us! — save that you nightly chafe your feet with a bit of woolen. You hear of it, — and you inquire, 'Where is Madame de Salisbury?' Here beyond doubt is the cock of Æsop's fable, who unearthed a gem and grumbled that his diamond was not a grain of corn."

"You shall be hanged at dawn," the King replied. "Meanwhile, do you spit out the last drop of your venom!"

"I say to you, then," John Copeland continued, "that to-day you are master of Europe. I say to you that, but for this fat and slow-witted woman, you would to-day be carrion in a pauper's grave. I say to you that, beyond question, you most magnanimously loved that shrew of Salisbury! because you fancied the color of her eyes, Lord Edward, and admired the angle between her nose and her forehead. Minstrels unborn will sing of this great love of yours. And I say to you, go home to your too tedious wife, the source of all your glory! sit at her feet! and let her teach you what love is!" John Copeland flung away the dagger. "There you have the truth. Now do you summon your attendants, my très beau sire, and have me hanged!"

The King made no movement. "You have been bold —" he said, at last.

"You also have been bold, sire. For twenty years you have dared to flout that love which is God's noblest heritage to His children."

King Edward sat in meditation for some while. The squinting of his left eye was now very noticeable.

"I consider my wife's clerk," he drily said, "to discourse of love in somewhat too much the tone of a lover." And a flush was his reward.

But when this Copeland spoke he was like one transfigured. His voice was grave, and wholly tender, and he said:

"As the fish have their life in the waters, so I have and always shall have mine in love. Love made me choose and dare to emulate a lady through whom I live contented, without expecting any other good. Her purity is so inestimable that I cannot say whether I derive more pride or sorrow from its pre-eminence. She does not love me, and she will never love me. She would condemn me to be hewed in fragments sooner than permit her husband's finger to be injured. Yet she surpasses other human beings so utterly that I would rather serve her welfare, and look always very fondly upon this lady's fond stupidity, than I would enjoy from any other woman all which a lover can devise."

Lord Edward stroked the table through this while, with an inverted pen. He cleared his throat. He said, half fretfully:

"Now, by the Face! it is not given every man to love precisely in this troubadourish fashion. Even the most generous person cannot render to love any more than that person happens to possess. I have read in an old tale how the devil sat upon a cathedral spire and white doves flew about him. Monks came and told him to begone. 'Do not the spires show you, O son of darkness,' they clamored, 'that the place is holy?' And Satan (in this old tale) replied that these spires were capable of various interpretations. I speak of symbols, John. Yet I also have loved, in my own fashion, — and, it would seem, I win the same reward as you."

The King said then, "And so she is at Stirling now? hobnob with my armed enemies, and cajoling that red lecher Robert Stewart?" He laughed, not overpleasantly. "Eh, yes, it needed a bold person to bring all your tidings! But you Brabanters are a very thoroughgoing people."

The King rose and flung back his high head. "John, the loyal service you have done us and our esteem for your valor are so great that they may well serve you as an excuse. May shame fall on those who bear you any ill will! You will now return home, and take your prisoner, the King of Scotland, and deliver him to my wife, to do with as she may elect. You will convey to her my entreaty — not my orders, John, — that she come to me here at Calais. As remuneration for this evening's insolence, I assign lands as near your house as you can choose them to the value of £500 a year for you and for your heirs."

You must know that John Copeland fell upon his knees before King Edward. "Sire — " he stammered.

The King raised him, saying: "No, John; you are the better man. Were there any equity in fate, John Copeland, your lady had loved you, not me. As it is, I must strive to prove not altogether unworthy of my fortune. But I make no large promises," he added, squinting horribly, "because the most generous person cannot render to love any more than that person happens to possess. So be off with you, John Copeland, — go, my squire, and bring me back my Queen! "

Presently he heard John Copeland singing without. And through that instant, they say, his youth returned to Edward Plantagenet, and all the scents and shadows and faint sounds of Valenciennes on that ancient night when a tall girl came to him, running, stumbling in her haste to bring him kingship. "She does not run now. She waddles," he thought forlornly. "Still, I am blessed." But Copeland sang, and the Brabanter's voice was big with joy.

Sang John Copeland:

"Long I besought thee, nor vainly, Daughter of Water and Air, —
Charis! Idalia! Hortensis!
Hast thou not heard the prayer,
When the blood stood still with loving,
And the blood in me leapt like wine,
And I cried on thy name, Melænis? —
That heard me, (the glory is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine!

" Falsely they tell of thy dying,
Thou that art older than death,
And never the Hörselberg hid thee,
Whatever the slanderer saith,
For the stars are as heralds forerunning,
When laughter and love combine
At twilight, in thy light, Melænis,—
That heard me, (the glory is thine!)
And let the heart of Atys,
At last, at last, be mine! "

THE END OF THE FIFTH NOVEL

VI

THE STORY OF THE SATRAPS

"Je suis voix au désert criant
Que chascun soyt rectifiant
La voye de Sauveur; non suis,
Et accomplir je ne le puis."

The Sixth Novel. — Anne of Bohemia has one sole friend, and by him plays the friend's part; and in so doing achieves their common anguish, as well as the confusion of statecraft and the poulticing of a great disease.

IN the year of grace 1381 (Nicolas begins) was Dame Anne magnificently fetched from remote Bohemia, and at Westminster married to Sire Richard, the second monarch of that name to reign in England. This king, I must tell you, had succeeded while he was yet an infant, to the throne of his grandfather, the third King Edward, about whom I have told you in the story preceding this story.

Queen Anne had presently noted a certain priest who went forbiddingly about her court, where he was accorded a provisional courtesy, and who went also into many hovels, where pitiable wrecks of humankind received his alms and ministrations.

Queen Anne made inquiries. This young cleric was amanuensis to the Duke of Gloucester, she learned, and was notoriously a by-blow of the Duke's brother, dead Lionel of Clarence. She sent for this Edward Maudelain. When he came her first thought was, "How wonderful is his likeness to the King!" while the thought's commentary ran, unacknowledged, "Yes, as an eagle resembles a falcon!" For here, to the observant eye, was a more zealous person, already passion-wasted, and a far more dictatorial and stiff-necked person than the lazy and amiable King; also, this Maudelain's face and nose were somewhat too long and high: the priest was, in a word, the less comely of the pair by a very little, and to an immeasurable extent the more kinglike.

"You are my cousin now, messire," the Queen told him, and innocently offered to his lips her own lips.

He never moved; but their glances crossed, and for that instant she saw the face of a man who has just stepped into a quicksand. She grew red, without knowing why. Then he spoke, composedly, of trivial matters. She stayed unkissed.

Thus began the Queen's acquaintance with Edward Maudelain. She was by this time the loneliest woman in the island. Her husband granted her a bright and fresh perfection of form and color, but desiderated any appetizing tang, and lamented, in his phrase, a certain kinship to the impeccable loveliness of some female saint in a jaunty tapestry; bright as ice in sunshine, just so her beauty chilled you, he complained: moreover, this daughter of the Cæsars had been fetched into England, chiefly, to breed him children, and this she had never done. Undoubtedly he had made a bad bargain, — he was too easy-going, people presumed upon it. His barons snatched their cue and esteemed Dame Anne to be negligible; whereas the clergy, finding that she obstinately read the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, under the irrelevant plea of not comprehending Latin, began to asperse her from their pulpits as a heretic and as the evil woman prophesied by Ezekiel.

It was the nature of this desolate child to crave affection, as a necessary, and pitifully she tried to purchase it through almsgiving. In the attempt she could have found no coadjutor more ready than Edward Maudelain. Giving was with these two a sort of obsession, though always he gave in a half scorn of his fellow creatures which was not more than half concealed. This bastard was charitable and pious because he knew his soul, conceived in double sin, to be doubly evil, and therefore doubly in need of redemption through good works.

Now, in and about the Queen's lonely rooms, the woman and the priest met daily to discuss now this or that point of theology, or now (to cite a single instance) Gammer Tudway's obstinate sciatica. Considerate persons found something of the pathetic in the Queen's preoccupation by such matters while, so clamantly, the dissension between the young King and his uncles gathered to a head. The King's uncles meant to continue governing England, with the King as their ward, as long as they could; he meant to relieve himself of this guardianship, and them of their heads, as soon as he was able. War seemed inevitable, the air was thick with portents; and was this, then, an appropriate time, the judicious demanded of high Heaven, for the Queen of imperiled England to be troubling herself about a peasant's toothache?

Long afterward was Edward Maudelain to remember this quiet and amiable period of his life, and to wonder over the man that he had been through this queer while. Embittered and suspicious she had found him, noted for the carping tongue he lacked both power and inclination to bridle; and she had, against his nature, made Maudelain see that every person is at bottom lovable, and that human vices are but the stains of a traveler midway in a dusty journey; she had incited the priest no longer to do good for his soul's eternal health, but simply for his fellow's benefit.

In place of that monstrous passion which had at his first view of her possessed the priest, now, like a sheltered taper, glowed an adoration which made him yearn, in defiance of common-sense, to suffer somehow for this beautiful and gracious comrade; though very often his pity for her loneliness, and his knowledge that she dared trust no one except him, would throttle Maudelain like two assassins, and would move the hot-blooded young man to a rapture of self-contempt and exultation.

Now Maudelain made excellent songs, it was a matter of common report. Yet but once in their close friendship did the Queen command him to make a song for her. This had been at Dover, about vespers, in the starved and tiny garden overlooking the English Channel, upon which her apartments faced; and the priest had fingered his lute for an appreciable while before he sang, more harshly than was his custom.

Sang Maudelain:

"Ave Maria! now cry we so
That see night wake and daylight go.

"Mother and Maid, in nothing incomplete,
This night that gathers is more light and fleet
Than life's long twilight trod with stumbling feet, Agentes semper uno animo.

"Ever we touch the prize we dare not take!
Ever we know that thirst we dare not slake!
Yet ever to a dreamed-of goal we make,— Est tui cæli in palatio!

"Long, long the road, and set with many a snare;
And to how small sure knowledge are we heir
That blindly tread, with twilight everywhere!
Volo in toto; sed non valeo!

"Long, long the road, and very frail are we
That may not lightly curb mortality,
Nor lightly tread together steadfastly,
Et parvum carmen unum facio:

"Mater, ora filium,
Ut post hoc exilium
Nobis donet gaudium
Beatorum omnium!"

Dame Anne had risen. She said nothing. She stayed in this posture for a lengthy while, one hand yet clasping each breast. Then she laughed, and began to speak of Long Simon's recent fever. Was there no method of establishing him in another cottage? No, the priest said, the peasants, like the cattle, were always deeded with the land, and Simon could not lawfully be taken away from his owner.

One day, about the hour of prime, in that season of the year when fields smell of young grass, the Duke of Gloucester sent for Edward Maudelain. The court was then at Windsor. The priest came quickly to his patron. He found the Duke in company with the King's other uncle, Edmund of York, and with them also sat bland Harry of Derby, who was John of Gaunt's oldest son, and in consequence the King's cousin. Each was a proud and handsome man: Derby alone (who became afterward King of England) had inherited the squint that distinguished this family. To-day Gloucester was gnawing at his finger nails; big York seemed half asleep; and the Earl of Derby appeared patiently to await something as yet ineffably remote.

"Sit down!" snarled Gloucester. His lean and evil countenance was that of a tired devil.

The priest obeyed, wondering that so high an honor should be accorded him in the company of three great noblemen.

Then Gloucester said, in his sharp way: "Edward, you know, as England knows, the King's intention toward us three and our adherents. It has come to our demolishment or his demolishment. I confess to a preference in the matter. I have consulted with the Pope concerning the advisability of taking the crown into my own hands. Edmund here does not want it, and my brother John is already achieving another crown in Spain. Eh, in imagination I was already King of England. And I had dreamed — Well! today the prosaic courier arrived. Urban — the Neapolitan swine! — dares give me no assistance. It is decreed I shall never reign in these islands. And I had dreamed — Meanwhile, De Vere and De la Pole are at the King day and night, urging revolt. As matters go, within a week or two the three heads before you will be embellishing Temple Bar. You, of course, they will only hang."

"We must avoid England, then, my noble patron," the priest considered.

Angrily the Duke struck a clenched fist upon the table. "By the Cross! we remain in England, you and I, and all of us. Others avoid. The Pope and the Emperor will have none of me. They plead for the Black Prince's heir, for the legitimate heir. Dompnedex! they shall have him!"

Maudelain recoiled, for he thought this twitching man insane.

"Besides, the King intends to take from me my fief at Sudbury," said the Duke of York, "in order to give it to De Vere. That is both absurd and monstrous and abominable."

Openly Gloucester sneered. "Listen! " he rapped out toward Maudelain. "When they were drawing up the Great Peace at Brétigny, it happened, as is notorious, that the Black Prince, my brother, wooed in this town the Demoiselle Alixe Riczi, whom in the outcome he abducted. It is not so generally known, however, that, finding this sister of the Vicomte de Montbrison a girl of obdurate virtue, my brother had prefaced the action by marriage."

"And what have I to do with all this? " said Edward Maudelain.

Gloucester retorted: "More than you think. For this Alixe was conveyed to Chertsey, here in England, where at the year's end she died in childbirth. A little before this time had Sir Thomas Holland seen his last day, — the husband of that Joane of Kent whom my brother throughout his life loved most marvelously. The disposition of the late Queen-Mother is tolerably well known. I make no comment save that to her molding my brother was as so much wax. In fine, the two lovers were presently married, and their son reigns to-day in England. The abandoned son of Alixe Riczi was reared by the Cistercians at Chertsey, where some years ago I found you."

Gloucester spoke with a half-stifled voice, wrenching forth each sentence; and now with a stiff forefinger he flipped a paper across the table. "In ex- tremis my brother did more than confess. He signed, — your Majesty," said Gloucester.

The Duke on a sudden flung out his hands, like a wizard whose necromancy fails, and the palms were bloodied where his nails had cut the flesh.

"Moreover, my daughter was born at Sudbury," said the Duke of York.

And of Maudelain's face I cannot tell you. He made pretense to read the paper carefully, but his eyes roved, and he knew that he stood among wolves. The room was oddly shaped, with eight equal sides: the ceiling was of a light and brilliant blue, powdered with many golden stars, and the walls were hung with smart tapestries which commemorated the exploits of Theseus.

"Then I am King," this Maudelain said aloud, "of France and England. I am Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitaine! I perceive that Heaven loves a jest." He wheeled upon Gloucester and spoke with singular irrelevance, "And what is to be done with the present Queen?"

Again the Duke shrugged. "I had not thought of the dumb wench. We have many convents."

Now Maudelain twisted the paper between his long, wet fingers and appeared to meditate.

"It would be advisable, your Grace," observed the Earl of Derby, suavely, and breaking his silence for the first time, "that you yourself should wed Dame Anne, once the Apostolic See has granted the necessary dispensations. Treading too close upon the fighting requisite to bring about the dethronement and death of our nominal lord the so-called King, a war with Bohemia, which would be only too apt to follow this noble lady's assassination, would be highly inconvenient. And unless she dies or remains the wife of the King of England, we would have to pay back her dowry."

Then these three princes rose and knelt before the priest; they were clad in long bright garments, and they glittered with gold and many jewels. He standing among them shuddered in his somber robe.

"Hail, King of England!" cried these three.

"Hail, ye that are my kinsmen!" he answered; "hail, ye that spring of an accursed race, as I do also! And woe to England for that hour wherein Manuel of Poictesme held traffic with the Sorceress of Provence, and the devil's son begot an heir for England! Of ice and of lust and of hell-fire are all we sprung; old records attest it; and fickle and cold and ravenous and without shame are all our race until the end. Of your brother's dishonor ye make merchandise to-day, and to-day fratricide whispers me, and leers, and, Heaven help me! I attend. O God of Gods! wilt Thou dare bid a man live stainless, having aforetime filled his veins with such a venom? Then haro, will I cry from Thy deepest hell . . . Oh, now let the adulterous Redeemer of Poictesme rejoice in his tall fires, to note that his descendants know of what wood to make a crutch! You are very wise, my kinsmen. Take your measures, messieurs who are my kinsmen! Though were I born of any other race, with what great swiftness would I now kill you, I that recognize within me the strength to do it! Then would I slay you! without any animosity, would I slay you then, just as I would kill as many splendid snakes! "

Maudelain went away, laughing. Gloucester drummed upon the table, his brows contracted. But the lean Duke said nothing. Big York seemed to drowse; and Henry of Derby smiled as he sounded a gong for that scribe who would draw up the necessary letters. The Earl's time was not yet come, but it was nearing.

In the antechamber the priest encountered two men-at-arms dragging a dead body from the castle. The Duke of Kent, Maudelain was informed, had taken a fancy to a peasant girl, and in remonstrance her misguided father had tugged at his Grace's sleeve.

Maudelain went into the park of Windsor, where he walked for a long while alone. It was a fine day in the middle spring; and now he seemed to understand for the first time how fair was his England. For all England was his fief, held in vassalage to God and to no man alive, his heart now sang; allwhither his empire spread, opulent in grain and metal and every revenue of the earth, and in stalwart men (his chattels), and in strong orderly cities, where the windows would be adorned with scarlet hangings, and women (with golden hair and red lax lips) would presently admire as King Edward rode slowly by at the head of a resplendent retinue. And always the King would bow, graciously and without haste, to his shouting people. . . . He laughed to find himself already at rehearsal of the gesture.

It was strange, though, that in this glorious fief of his so many persons should, as yet, live day by day as cattle live, suspicious of all other moving things (with reason), and roused from their incurious and filthy apathy only when some glittering baron, like a resistless eagle, swept uncomfortably near as he passed on some by-errand of the more bright and windy upper world. East and north they had gone yearly, for so many centuries, these dumb peasants, to fight out their master's uncomprehended quarrel, and to manure with their carcasses the soil of France and of Scotland. Give these serfs a king, now, who (being absolute) might dare to deal in perfect equity with rich and poor, who with his advent would bring Peace into England as his bride, as Trygæus did very anciently in Athens — "And then," the priest paraphrased, "may England recover all the blessings she has lost, and everywhere the glitter of active steel will cease." For everywhere men would crack a rustic jest or two, unhurriedly. Green fields in which so many battles had been fought would heave brownly under their plows; and these peasants would find, with practice, that it was almost as easy to chuckle as it was to cringe.

Meanwhile, on every side, the nobles tyrannized in their degree, well clothed and nourished, but at bottom equally comfortless in condition. For an instant, as though that endless turmoil had been revealed by lightning, Maudelain saw the many factions of his barons everywhere squabbling for gross pleasures, like wolves over a corpse, and blindly dealing death to one another so as to secure at least one more delicious gulp before that inevitable mangling by the teeth of some burlier colleague. The complete misery of England showed before Maudelain like a winter landscape. The thing was questionless. He must tread henceforward without fear among frenzied beasts, and to their ultimate welfare. On a sudden Maudelain knew himself to be invincible and fine; and hesitancy ebbed.

It was true that Richard, the frittering scoffer, must die. Squarely the priest faced that need: to spare King Richard was beyond his power, and that foolish boy was his brother; yes, this oncoming King Edward the Fourth would be a fratricide, and after death would be irrevocably damned. To burn, and eternally to burn, and, worst of all, to know that the torment was eternal! ay, it would be hard; but, at the cost of Richard's ignoble life and of his own inconsiderable soul, to win so many men to manhood, was not a bargain to be refused.

The tale tells that Maudelain went toward the little garden which adjoined Dame Anne's apartments. He found the Queen there, alone, as nowadays she lived for most hours, and he paused to wonder at her bright and singular beauty. How vaguely odd was this beauty! he reflected, too; how alien in its effect to that of any other woman in sturdy England, and how associable it was, somehow, with every wild and gracious denizen of the woods which blossomed yonder.

In this place the world was all sunlight, temperate but undiluted. They had met in a wide, unshaded plot of grass, too short to ripple, which everywhere glowed steadily, like a gem. Right and left, birds sang as if in a contest. The sky was cloudless, a faint and radiant blue throughout, save where the sun stayed as yet in the zenith, so that the Queen's brows cast honey-colored shadows upon each cheek. The priest was greatly troubled by the proud and heatless brilliancies, and the shrill joys, of every object within the reach of his senses.

She was splendidly clothed, in a kirtle of very bright green, tinted like the verdancy of young ferns in sunlight, and she wore, over all, a gown of white, cut open on each side as far as the hips. This garment was embroidered with golden leopards and was trimmed with ermine. About her yellow hair was a chaplet of gold, wherein emeralds glowed. Her blue eyes were as large and shining and changeable (he thought) as two oceans in midsummer. No woman could be lovelier than was this woman, the priest reflected.

Now all elation had departed from Edward Maudelain, and he laughed discordantly.

"Wait — ! O my only friend — ! " said Maudelain.

Then in a level voice he told her all which had happened that day, speaking unhurriedly and without any apparent emotion.

She had breathed once, with a deep inhalation. She had averted her countenance from his gaze. Presently she said:

"This means more war, for De Vere and Tressilian and De la Pole and Bramber and others of the barons know that the King's fall signifies their ruin. Many thousands die to-morrow."

He answered, "It means a war which will make me King of England, and will make you my wife."

"In that war the well-armed nobles will ride abroad with banners and gay surcoats, and will kill and ravish in the pauses of their songs; while daily in that war the naked peasants will kill the one the other, without knowing why."

His thought had forerun hers. "Yes, some must die, so that in the end I may be King, and the general happiness may rest at my disposal. The adventure of this world is wonderful, and it goes otherwise than under the strict tutelage of reason."

"It would not be yours, but Gloucester's and his barons'. Friend, they would set you on the throne to be their puppet and to move only as they pulled the strings. Thwart them in their maraudings, and they will fling you aside, as the barons have pulled down every king that dared oppose them. No, they desire to live pleasantly, to have fish on Fridays, and white bread and the finest wine the whole year through, and there is not enough for all, say they. Can you alone contend against them? and conquer so much of folly and greediness single-handed? for not unless you can do this may I dare bid you reign."

The sun had grown too bright, too merciless, but, as always, she drew the truth from him. "I could not venture to oppose in anything the barons who supported my cause: for if I did, I would not reign a fortnight. Heaven help us, nor you nor I nor anyone may transform through any personal force this bitter world, this piercing, cruel place of frost and pallid sunlight. Charity and truth are excommunicate, and a king is only an adorned and fearful person who leads wolves toward their quarry, lest, lacking it, they turn and devour him. Everywhere the powerful labor to put one another out of worship, and each to stand the higher with the other's corpse as his pedestal; and lechery and greed and hatred sway these glittering, inconsiderate fools as cold winds carry away the gay leaves of autumn. We walk among shining vapors, we aspire to overpass a mountain of unstable sparkling sand! We two alone in all the scuffling world! Oh, it is horrible, and I think that Satan plans the jest! We dream for a while of refashioning this bright desolation, and know that we alone can do it! we are as demigods, you and I, in those gallant dreams! and at the end we can but poultice the hurts of filthy peasants and mix cough sirups! "

The Queen answered sadly: " Once, and only once, did God tread this tangible world, for a very little while; and, look you, to what trivial matters He devoted that brief space! Only to chat with fishermen, and to talk with light women, and to consort with rascals, and at last to die between two cutpurses, ignominiously! If Christ Himself achieved nothing which seemed great and admirable, how should we two hope to do any more? "

He answered: " It is true. Of anise and of cumin the Master gets His tithe — " Maudelain broke off, with a yapping laugh. " Puf! Heaven is wiser than we. Heaven has decreed that by right of birth I must be King of England and your bedfellow. That is my heritage."

" It means war. Many will die. Thousands will die, and many others will be hurt and maimed, and to no betterment of affairs."

" I am King of England. I am Heaven's satrap here, and answerable to Heaven alone. That also, with your love and your obedience, madame, is my heritage."

Now his large and cruel eyes were aflame as he regarded her.

And visibly beneath their glare the woman changed. "My friend, must I not love you any longer? You would be content with happiness? Then I am jealous of that happiness! for you are the one friend that I have had, and you are so dear to me — Look you!" she said, with a light, wistful laugh, "there have been times when I was jealous of everything you touched, and I hated every being you looked at. I would not have you stained; I desired to pass my whole life between the four walls of some dingy and eternal gaol, forever alone with you, lest you become like other men. I would in that period have been the very bread you eat, the clod you touch in crushing it; I detested the objects of your charity; and I have often disliked some pleasure that I derived from life because I might not transfer it to you undiminished. I have always wanted in some way to make you happy at the price of a discomfort endured by me. . . . It was wicked, I know, for St. Augustine forbids such fancies, and the imagining of it made me very happy."

Now while he listened to this dear and tranquil speaking, Edward Maudelain's raised hands had fallen. He said:

"With reason Augustine crieth out against the lust of the eyes. 'For pleasure seeketh objects beautiful, melodious, fragrant, savory, and soft; but this disease seeketh objects which are contrary as well, not for the sake of suffering annoyance, but out of the lust of making trial of them! ' I also have lusted to make others happy at the price of a discomfort endured by me. I have sinned grievously through pride. Too curiously I planned my own damnation, too presumptuously I esteemed my soul a worthy scapegoat, and I gilded my enormity with many lies. Yet indeed, indeed, I had believed brave things, I had planned a not ignoble bargain — ! Ey, say, is it not laughable, madame? — as my birthright Heaven accords me a penny, and with that only penny I must presently be seeking to bribe Heaven."

She waited, meditating very sorrowfully. . . .

Then he said: " Yet are we indeed God's satraps, as but now I cried in my vainglory, and we hold within our palms the destiny of many peoples. Depardieux! God is wiser than we are. Still, Satan offers no unhandsome bribes, — bribes that are tangible and sure. For Satan, too, is wiser than we are."

They stood like effigies, lit by the broad, unsparing splendor of the morning, but again their kindling eyes had met, and now the man shuddered. " Decide! oh, do you decide this matter very quickly, my only friend! " he said, " for throughout I am all filth! "

She drew close to him. She laid one hand upon each shoulder.

" O my only friend! " she breathed, with red lax lips which now were very near to his lips, "through these six years I have ranked your friendship as the chief of all my honors! and I pray with an entire heart that I may die so soon as I have done what I must do to-day!"

Now Maudelain was trying to smile, but he could not quite manage it. "God save King Richard!" said the priest. "For by the cowardice and greed and ignorance of little men is Salomon himself confounded, and by them is Hercules lightly unhorsed. Were I Leviathan, whose bones were long ago picked clean by pismires, I could perform nothing against the will of many human pismires. Therefore do you pronounce my doom."

"O King," then said Dame Anne, "I bid you go forever from the court and live forever a landless man, friendless, and without even any name. Otherwise, you can in no way escape being made an instrument to bring about the misery and the destruction of your fellows here. This doom I dare adjudge and to pronounce, because we are royal and God's satraps, you and I."

Twice or thrice his dry lips had moved before he spoke. He was aware of innumerable birds that caroled with a piercing and intolerable sweetness.

"O Queen!" he said, "O fellow satrap! Heaven has many faithless stewards. A fair province is wasted and accords to Heaven no revenue. So wastes beauty, and a shrewd wit, and an illimitable charity, which of their pride go in fetters and achieve no increase. To-day the young King junkets with his flatterers. You have that carnal beauty by which men are lightly conquered, and the mere sight of which may well cause a man's voice to tremble as my voice trembles now, and through desire of which — But I tread afield! Of that bright-colored flesh and of the lewdness it awakens you have made no profit. O daughter of the Cæsars, I bid you now gird up each loin for toil. Old Legion must be fought with fire. This age is sick. We cannot cure it. We are not demigods. We can but poultice its hurts, mix cough sirups — "

His hand had torn open his somber gown, and the man's bared breast shone in the sunlight, and on his breast heaved sleek and glittering beads of sweat. Twice he cried the Queen's name.

In a while he said: " I bid you weave incessantly such snares of brain and body as may lure King Richard to be rid of his uncles' mastership, and to be swayed instead by you, so that in some sort you may protect my fief. I bid you guide this shallow-hearted fool into commendable action. I bid you live as other folk do hereabouts. Coax! beg! cheat! wheedle! lie! " he barked like a teased dog. " Leave off these sheltered charities and virtues, which profit nobody, and do you play, as a queen should, the prostitute for him that wears my crown, and do you thus achieve in part the task which is denied me."

She answered: " I will do what I may. Yet nothing will ever greatly matter now, now that I may not ever see you any more, my dearest."

Her eyes had filled with tears; she was unhappy, and, as always, this knowledge roused in Maudelain a sort of frenzied pity and a hatred, quite illogical, of all other things existent. She was unhappy, that only he comprehended: and for her to be made unhappy was unjust.

So Maudelain stood thus for an appreciable silence, staying motionless save that behind his back his fingers were bruising one another. Everywhere was this or that bright color and an incessant melody. It was unbearable. Then it was over: the ordered progress of all happenings, in a world wherein every child of God had each, in some fashion, his Father's honor to uphold, seemed to the priest apparent, simple, and natural. He could best uphold that honor through exile, and she, through fornication with a frittering scoffer: in Heaven's eyes each loyal service was the same: and contentment came into Edward Maudelain's heart like a flight of linnets over level fields at dawn. He left her, and as he went he sang.

Sang Maudelain:

" Christ save us all, as well He can,
A solis ortus cardine!
For He is both God and man,
Qui natus est de virgine,
And we but part of His wide plan

That sing, and heartily sing we,
'Gloria Tibi, Domine!'

"Between a heifer and an ass
Enixa est puerpera;
In ragged woolen clad He was Qui regnat super æthera,
And patiently may we then pass
That sing, and heartily sing we,
'Gloria Tibi, Domine!'"

The Queen shivered in the glad sunlight. "I am, it must be, pitiably weak," she said at last, "because I cannot sing as he does. And, since I am not very wise, were he to return even now — But he will not return. He will never return," the Queen repeated, carefully. "It is strange I cannot comprehend that he will never return!"

She heard his singing no more. But to every side of her the birds of the wildwood sang joyously.

She sent for the King that evening, after supper, and they may well have talked of many matters, for he did not return to his own apartments that night. Next day the English barons held a council, and in the midst of it King Richard demanded to be told his age.

"Your Grace is in your twenty-second year," said the uneasy Gloucester. The Duke had excellent reason to be troubled, since he had been vainly seeking everywhere for vanished Edward Maudelain, and Gloucester knew his game to depend upon that lost pawn.

The King replied: "Then I have been under tutors and governors longer than any other ward in my dominion. My lords, I thank you for your past services, but I need them no more."

They had no check handy, and Gloucester in particular foreread his death-warrant. But of necessity he shouted with York and Derby, and with all the others, "Hail, King of England!" It did not matter, now, to whom that greeting had been given yesterday.

That afternoon the King's assumption of all royal responsibility was commemorated by a tournament, over which Dame Anne presided. Sixty of her ladies led as many knights by silver chains into the tilting grounds at Smithfield, and it was remarked that the Queen appeared unusually mirthful. The King also was in high good humor, and seemed to have become overnight that pattern of conjugal devotion which this easy-going Richard was to remain for the rest of Dame Anne's brief life. Then the royal pair retired, at dusk, to the Bishop of London's palace at Saint Paul's, where was held a merry banquet, with dancing both before and after supper.

THE STORY OF THE HERITAGE

"Pour vous je suis en prison mise,
En ceste chambre à voulte grise,
Et traineray ma triste vie
Sans que jamais mon cueur varie,
Car toujours seray vostre amye."

The Seventh Novel. — Isabel of Valois, being forsaken by all others, is befriended by a priest, who, in chief through a child's innocence, contrives and executes a laudable imposture, and wins thereby to death.

The Story of the Heritage

IN the year of grace 1399 (Nicolas begins) dwelt in a hut near Caer Dathyl in Arvon, as he had dwelt for some five years, a gaunt hermit, notoriously consecrate, whom neighboring Welshmen revered as the Blessed Evrawc. There had been a time when people called him Edward Maudelain, but this period he dared not often remember.

For though in macerations of the flesh, in fasting, and in hour-long prayers he spent his days, this holy man was much troubled by devils. He got little rest because of them. Sometimes would come into his hut Belphegor in the likeness of a butler, and whisper, "Sire, had you been King, as was your right, you had drunk to-day not water but the wines of Spain and Hungary." Or Asmodeus saying, "Sire, had you been King, as was your right, you had lain now not upon the bare earth but on cushions of silk."

One day in early spring, they say, the spirit called Orvendile sent the likeness of a fair woman with yellow hair and large blue eyes. She wore a massive crown which seemed too heavy for her frailness to sustain. Soft, tranquil, very friendly eyes had lifted from the prayer-book which was in her hand. "You are my cousin now, messire," this phantom had appeared to say, with lips which raised confidingly toward the lips of Blessed Evrawc.

That was the worst, and Maudelain began to fear for his own reason after that, because even that the Blessed Evrawc had resisted with many aves.

There came also to his hut, through a sullen snowstorm, upon the afternoon of All Souls' Day, a horseman in a long cloak of black. He tethered his black horse and he came noiselessly through the doorway of the hut, and upon his breast and shoulders the snow was white as the bleached bones of those women that died in Merlin's youth.

"Greetings, in God's name, Messire Edward Maudelain!" the stranger said.

Since the newcomer spoke intrepidly of holy things a cheerier Maudelain knew that this at least was no demon. "Greetings!" he answered. "But I am Evrawc. You name a man long dead."

"Yet it is from a certain Bohemian woman I come. What matter, then, if the dead receive me?"

Thus speaking, the stranger dropped his cloak.

He was clad, as you now saw, in flame-colored satin, which shimmered with each movement like a high flame. He had the appearance of a tall, lean youngster, with crisp, curling, very dark red hair. He now regarded Edward Maudelain, with peculiarly wide-set brown eyes; and their gaze was tender.

"Eh, from the dead to the dead I travel, as always," said the newcomer, " with a message and a token. And all that I may bring to them from out of the Marches of Antan is but a seeming and an echo. Yet my message runs, Time is, O fellow satrap! and my token is this."

In this packet, wrapped with white parchment and tied with a golden cord, was only a lock of hair. It lay like a little yellow serpent in Maudelain's palm.

" And yet five years ago," he said, " this hair was turned to dust. God keep us all! "

Then he saw the tall lean emissary puffed out like a candle flame; and upon the floor he saw the huddled black cloak waver and spread like ink, and then vanish, and he saw the white parchment slowly dwindle, as snow melts under the open sun. But in his hand remained the lock of yellow hair.

" O my only friend," said Maudelain, " I may not comprehend, but I know that by no unhallowed art have you won back to me." Hair by hair he scattered upon the floor that which he held. " Time is! and I have not need of any token to spur my memory."

He prized up a corner of the hearthstone, took out a small leather bag, and that day purchased a horse and a sword.

At dawn the Blessed Evrawc rode eastward in secular apparel. Two weeks later he came to Sunninghill; and it happened that, on the same morning, the Earl of Salisbury, who had excellent reason to consider . . .

Follows a lacuna of fourteen pages. But Maudelain's imposture of his half brother, Richard the Second, so strangely favored by their physical resemblance, and the subsequent fiasco at Circencester, are tolerably familiar to students of history.

In one way or another, it is known, Maudelain contrived to take the place of his now dethroned brother, and by and by to take also the punishment designed for Richard. It would seem evident, from the Argument of the story in hand, that Nicolas de Caen attributes a large part of this mysterious business to the coöperancy of Isabel of Valois, King Richard's eleven-year-old wife. And (should one have a taste for the deductive) the foregoing name of Orvendile, when compared with The Story of the Scabbard, would certainly hint that Owain Glyndwyr had a finger in the affair.

But it is not known just how this Edward Maudelain was substituted in the place of his younger brother. Nicolas de Caen, however, if you are to believe his Epilogue, had the best of reasons for declaring that the prisoner locked up in Pontefract Castle in the February of 1400, after Harry of Derby had seized the crown of England, was not Richard Plantagenet; as is attested, also, by the remaining fragment of this same Story of the Heritage.

. . . and eight men-at-arms followed him.

Quickly Maudelain rose from the table, pushing his tall chair aside, and as he did this, one of the soldiers closed the door securely.

"Nay, eat your fill, Sire Richard," said Piers Exton, "since you will not ever eat again."

"Is it so?" the trapped man answered quietly. "Then indeed you come in a good hour." Once only he smote upon his breast. "Mea culpa! O Eternal Father, do Thou shrive me very quickly of all those sins which I have committed, both in thought and deed, for now the time is very short."

And Exton spat upon the dusty floor. "Foh, they had told me I would find a king here. I discover only a cat that whines."

"Then 'ware his claws!" As a viper leaps Maudelain sprang upon the nearest fellow and wrested away his halberd. "Then 'ware his claws, my men! For I too come of a fanged race. So now let some of you lament that hour wherein the devil's son begot an heir for England! For of ice and of lust and of hell-fire are all we sprung; old records attest it; and fickle and cold and ravenous and without fear are all our race until the end. Hah, until the end! O God of Gods!" this Maudelain cried, with a great voice, "wilt Thou dare bid a man die patiently, having aforetime filled his veins with such a venom? For I lack the grace to die as all Thy saints have died, without one carnal blow struck in my own defense. I lack the grace, my Father, since even at the last the devil's blood You gave me is not quelled. I atone now for that sin done by my father in the flesh. But I atone as befits the race of Oriander! "

Then it was he and not they who pressed to the attack. Their meeting was a bloody business, for in that dark and crowded room Maudelain raged among his nine antagonists like a lion among wolves.

They struck at random and cursed shrilly, for they were now half afraid of the madman they had trapped; so that presently he was all hacked and bleeding, though as yet he had no mortal wound. Four of these men he had killed by this time, and Piers Exton also lay at his feet.

Then the other four drew back a little. " Are ye tired so soon? " said Maudelain, and he laughed terribly. " What, even you! Why, look ye, my bold veterans, I never killed before to-day, and I am not breathed as yet."

Thus he boasted, exulting in his madness. But the other men saw that, behind him, Piers Exton had crawled into the chair from which (as they thought) King Richard had just risen; and they saw Exton standing erect in this chair, with both arms raised. They saw this Exton strike the King with his pole-ax, from behind, once only, and they knew no more was needed.

" By God! " said one of them in the ensuing stillness, " that was a cowardly blow well struck. And a throne went down beneath it."

But the dying man who lay before them made as though to smile. "I charge you all to witness," he very faintly said, "how willingly I render to Cæsar's daughter that which was ever hers."

Then Exton fretted, as if with a trace of shame. "Who would have thought the rascal had remembered that first wife of his so long? Cæsar's daughter, saith he! and dares in extremis to pervert Holy Scripture like any Wycliffite! Well, he is as dead as that first Cæsar now, and our good King Harry of Derby will sleep the better for it. And yet — God only knows! for they are an odd race, even as he said, — these men that have old Manuel's blood in them."

THE STORY OF THE SCABBARD

"Ainsi il avoit trouvé sa mie
Si belle qu'on put souhaiter.
N'avoit cure d'ailleurs plaider,
Fors qu'avec lui manoir et estre.
Bien est Amour puissant et maistre."

The Eighth Novel. — Branwen of Wales gets a king's love unwittingly, and in all innocence convinces him of the littleness of his kingdom; so that he bespeaks, and in due course occupies, another realm as yet unmapped.

The Story of the Scabbard

IN the year of grace 1400 (Nicolas begins) King Richard, the second monarch of that name to rule in England, wrenched his own existence, and nothing more, from the close wiles of his cousin, Harry of Derby, who was now sometimes called Henry of Lancaster, and sometimes Bolingbroke. The circumstances of this evasion having been recorded in the preceding tale, it suffices here to record that this Henry was presently crowned King of England in Richard's place. All persons, saving only this Henry of Lancaster and Owain Glyndwyr, believed King Richard dead on the day that Richard attended his own funeral, as a proceeding taking to the fancy, and, among many others, saw the body of Edward Maudelain interred with every regal ceremony in the chapel at Langley Bower. Then, alone, Sire Richard crossed the seas, and at thirty-three set out to inspect a transformed and gratefully untrammeling world wherein not a foot of land belonged to him.

Holland was the surname he assumed, the name of his half-brothers; and to detail his Asian wanderings would be tedious and unprofitable. But at the end of each four months would come to him a certain messenger from Glyndwyr, supposed by Richard to be the imp Orvendile, who notoriously ran every day around the world upon the Welshman's business. It was in the Isle of Taprobane, where the pismires are as great as hounds, and mine and store the gold of which the inhabitants afterward rob them through a most cunning device, that this emissary brought the letter which read simply, "Now is England fit pasture for the White Hart." Presently Richard Holland was in Wales, and then he rode to Sycharth.

There, after salutation, Glyndwyr gave an account of his long stewardship. It was a puzzling record of obscure and tireless machinations with which we have no immediate concern: in brief, the barons who had ousted King Log had been the very first to find their squinting King Stork intolerable; and Northumberland, Worcester, Douglas, Mortimer, and so on, were already pledged and in open revolt. "By the God I do not altogether serve," Owain ended, "you have but to declare yourself, sire, and within the moment England is yours."

Richard spoke, with narrowed eyes. "You forget that while Henry of Lancaster lives no other man can ever hope to reign tranquilly in these islands. Come then! the hour strikes; and we will coax the devil for once in a way to serve God."

"Oh, but there is a boundary appointed," Glyndwyr moodily returned. "You, too, forget that in cold blood this Henry stabbed my best-loved son. But I do not forget this, and I have tried divers methods which we need not speak of, — I who can at will corrupt the air, and cause sickness and storms, raise heavy mists, and create plagues and fires and shipwrecks; yet the life itself I cannot take. For there is a boundary appointed, sire, and beyond that frontier the Master of our Sabbaths cannot serve us even though he would."

Richard crossed himself. "You horribly mistake my meaning. Your practices are your own affair, and in them I decline to dabble. I merely design to trap a tiger with his appropriate bait. For you have a fief at Caer Idion, I think? — Very well! I intend to herd your sheep there, for a week or two, after the honorable example of Apollo. It is your part to see that Henry knows I am living disguised and defenseless at Caer Idion."

The gaunt Welshman chuckled. "Yes, squinting Henry of Lancaster would not delay to cross the world, much less the Severn, in order to make sure of Richard's death. He would come in his own person with at most some twenty trustworthy followers. I will have a hundred there; and certain aging scores will then be settled in that place." Glyndwyr meditated afterward, very evilly. "Sire," he said without prelude, "I do not recognize Richard of Bordeaux. You have garnered much in traveling! "

"Why, look you," Richard returned, "I have garnered so much that I do not greatly care whether this scheme succeeds or does not succeed. With age, I begin to contend even more indomitably that a wise man will consider no serious matter quite seriously. You barons here believe it an affair of importance who may chance to be the King of England, say, this time next year; you take sides between Henry and me. I tell you frankly that neither of us, that no man in the world, by reason of his innate limitations, can ever rule otherwise than abominably, or, ruling, can create anything save discord. Nor can I see how this matters, either, since the discomfort of an ant village is not, after all, a planet-wrecking disaster. No, Owain, if the planets do indeed sing together, it is, depend upon it, to the burden of Fools All. For I am as liberally endowed as most people; and when I consider my abilities, my performances, my instincts, and so on, quite aloofly, as I would appraise those of some person who did not pester me so often, I can only shrug; and to conceive that common-sense, much more Omnipotence, would ever concern itself about the actions of a creature so entirely futile is, to me at least, impossible."

"I have known the thought," said Owain, — "though rarely since I found the Englishwoman that was afterward my wife, and never since my son, my Gruffyd, was murdered by a jesting man. He was more like me than the others, people said. . . . You are as yet the empty scabbard, powerless alike for help or hurt. Ey, hate or love must be the sword, sire, that informs us here; and then, if only for a little while, we are as gods."

"Pardie! I have loved as often as Salomon, and in fourteen kingdoms."

"We of Cymry have a saying, sire, that when a man loves par amours the second time he may safely assume that he has never been in love at all."

"— And I hate Henry of Lancaster as I do the Devil."

"I greatly fear," said Owain, with a sigh, "lest it may be your irreparable malady to hate nothing, not even that which you dislike. No, you consider things with both eyes open, with an unmanly rationality: whereas this Henry views all matters with that heroic squint which came into your family from Poictesme."

"Be off with your dusty scandals!" said Richard, laughing.

So then Glyndwyr rode south to besiege and burn the town of Caerdyf, while at Caer Idion Richard Holland abode tranquilly for some three weeks. There was in this place only Caradawc (the former shepherd), his wife Alundyne, and their sole daughter Branwen. They gladly perceived Sire Richard was no more a peasant than he was a curmudgeon; as Caradawc observed:

"It is perfectly apparent that the robe of Padarn Beisrudd, which refuses to adjust itself to any save high-born persons, would fit this Richard Holland as a glove does the hand. But we will ask no questions, since it is not wholesome to dispute the orderings of Owain Glyndwyr."

Now day by day would Richard Holland drive the flocks to pasture near the Severn, and loll there in the shade, and make songs to his lute. He grew to love this leisured life of bright and open spaces, and its long solitudes, grateful with the warm odors of growing things and with poignant bird noises. The tranquillity of these meadows, that were always void of hurry, bedrugged the man through many fruitless and contented hours.

Each day at noon Branwen would bring his dinner; and she would sometimes chat with him while he ate. After supper he would discourse to Branwen of remote kingdoms, through which, as aimlessly as a wind veers, he had ridden at adventure, among fantastic and strangely conditioned persons who adjudged him a madman; and she, in turn, would tell him curious tales from the Red Book of Hergest, — telling of Gwalchmai, and Peredur, and Geraint, in each one of which fine heroes she had presently discerned an inadequate forerunnership of Richard's existence.

This Branwen was a fair wench, slender and hardy. She had the bold demeanor of a child who is ignorant of evil and, in consequence, of suspicion. Happily, though, had she been named for that unhappy lady of old, the wife of King Matholwch, for this Branwen, too, had a white, thin, wistful face, like that of an empress on a silver coin which time has a little worn away. Her eyes were large and brilliant, colored like clear emeralds, and her abundant hair was so much corn floss, only it was more brightly yellow and was of immeasurably finer texture. In full sunlight, her cheeks were frosted like the surface of a peach, but the underlying cool pink of them was, rather, that of a cloud just after sunset, Richard decided. In all, a taking morsel! though her shapely hands were hard with labor, and she rarely laughed; for, as if to balance matters, her heart was tender, and she rarely ceased to smile as though she were thinking of some peculiar and wonderful secret which she intended, in due time, to share with you and with nobody else. Branwen had many lovers, and preferred among them young Gwyllem ap Llyr, a portly lad, who was handsome enough, though he had tiny and piggish eyes, and who sang divinely.

One day this Gwyllem came to Richard with two quarterstaves. "Saxon," he said, "you appear a stout man. Take your pick of these, then, and have at you!"

"Such are not the weapons I would have named," Richard answered: "yet in reason, Messire Gwyllem, I can deny you nothing that means nothing to me."

With that, they laid aside their coats and fell to exercise. In these unaccustomed bouts Richard was as soundly drubbed as he had expected to be, but he found himself the stronger man of the two, and he managed somehow to avoid an absolute overthrow.

"I have forgotten what we are fighting about," Richard observed, after ten minutes of these heroic thumps and bangings; "or, to be perfectly exact, I have not yet been told what we are fighting about. But we will fight no more in this place. Come and go with me to Welshpool, Messire Gwyllem, and there we will fight to a conclusion over good sack and claret!"

"Content!" cried Gwyllem; "but only if you yield me Branwen."

"Have we indeed wasted a whole half-hour in squabbling over a woman?" Richard demanded; "like two children in a world-wide toyshop over any one particular toy? Then devil take me if I am not heartily ashamed of my folly! Though, look you, Gwyllem, I would speak naught save commendation of these delicate and livelily tinted creatures so long as one is able to approach them in a becoming spirit of levity: it is only their not infrequent misuse which I would condemn; and in my opinion the person who elects to build a shrine for any one of them has only himself to blame if his chosen goddess will accept no burnt offering except his honor and his happiness. Yet since time's youth have many fine men been addicted to this insane practice, as, for example, were Hercules and Merlin and Holofernes, to their illimitable sorrow; and, indeed, the more I reconsider the old gallantries of Salomon and of Charlemaigne and of Sardanapalus, and of many other venerable and sagacious potentates, the more profoundly am I ashamed of my sex."

Gwyllem said: "This lazy gabbling of yours is all very fine. Perhaps it is also reasonable. Only, when you love you do not reason."

"I was endeavoring to prove that," said Richard gently.

Then they went to Welshpool, ride and tie on Gwyllem's horse. Tongue loosened by the claret, Gwyllem raved aloud of Branwen, like a babbling faun, while to each rapture Richard affably assented. In his heart he likened the boy to Dionysos at Naxos, and could find no blame for Ariadne. Moreover, the room was comfortably dark and cool, for thick vines hung about the windows, rustling and tapping pleasantly, and Richard was content.

"She does not love me?" Gwyllem cried. "It is well enough. I do not come to her as one merchant to another, since love was never bartered. Listen, Saxon!"

He caught up Richard's lute. The strings shrieked beneath Gwyllem's fingers as he fashioned his rude song.

Sang Gwyllem:

"Love me or love me not, it is enough
That I have loved you, seeing my whole life is Uplifted and made glad by the glory of Love,—
My life that was a scroll bescrawled and blurred

With tavern-catches, which that pity of his Erased, and wrote instead one lonely word,
O Branwen!

"I have accorded you incessant praise
And song and service, dear, because of this;
And always I have dreamed incessantly
Who always dreamed, When in oncoming days
This man or that shall love you, and at last
This man or that shall win you, it must be
That, loving him, you will have pity on me
When happiness engenders memory
And long thoughts, nor unkindly, of the past,
O Branwen!

"Of this I know not surely, who am sure
That I shall always love you while I live,
And that, when I am dead, with naught to give
Of song or service, Love will yet endure,
And yet retain his last prerogative,
When I lie still, and sleep out centuries,
With dreams of you and the exceeding love
I bore you, and am glad dreaming thereof,
And give God thanks for all, and so find peace,
O Branwen!"

"Now, were I to get as tipsy as that," Richard enviously thought, midway in a return to his stolid sheep, "I would simply go to sleep and wake up with a headache. And were I to fall as many fathoms deep in love as this Gwyllem ventures, or, rather, as he hurls himself with a splurge, I would perform — I wonder, now, what miracle? "

For he was, with whatsoever vagueness, discontent. This Gwyllem was so young, so earnest over every trifle, and above all, he was so untroubled by forethought: each least desire controlled him, as varying winds sport with a fallen leaf, whose frank submission to superior vagaries the boy appeared to emulate. Richard saw that in a fashion Gwyllem was superb. "And heigho!" said Richard, "I am attestedly a more unthrifty fool than he, but I begin to weary of a folly so thin-blooded."

The next morning came a ragged man, riding upon a mule. He declared himself a tinker. He chatted out an hour with Richard, who perfectly recognized him as Sir Walter Blount; and then this tinker crossed the Severn, returning into England.

Richard whistled. "Now my cousin will be quite sure, and now my anxious cousin will come to speak with Richard of Bordeaux. And now, by every Saint in the Calendar! I am as good as King of England."

He sat down beneath a young oak and twisted four or five blades of grass between his fingers while he meditated. Undoubtedly, he would kill this squinting Henry of Lancaster with a clear conscience and even with a certain relish, much as one crushes the uglier sort of vermin; but, hand upon heart, Richard was unable to avow any particularly ardent desire for the scoundrel's death. Thus crudely to demolish the knave's adroit and year-long schemings savored actually of grossness. The spider was venomous, and his destruction laudable: granted, but in crushing him you ruined his web, a miracle of patient machination, which, despite yourself, compelled hearty admiring and envy. True, the process would recrown a certain Richard, but then, as Richard recalled it, being King was rather tedious. Richard, now, was not quite sure that he wanted to be King, and, in consequence, to be plagued, day in, day out, by a host of vexatious and ever-squabbling barons. "I shall miss the little huzzy, too," he thought.

"Heigho!" said Richard, "I shall console myself with purchasing all beautiful things that can be touched and handled. Life is a flimsy vapor which passes and is not any more: presently Branwen will be married to this Gwyllem and will be grown fat and old, and I shall be remarried to little Dame Isabel, and shall be King of England: and a trifle later all four of us shall be dead. Pending this deplorable consummation, a wise man will endeavor to amuse himself."

Next day he dispatched Caradawc to Owain Glyndwyr, to bid the latter send the promised implements to Caer Idion. Richard, returning to the hut the same evening, found Alundyne there, alone, and groveling at the threshold. Her forehead was bloodied when she raised it and through tearless sobs told of what had happened. A half-hour earlier, while she and Branwen were intent upon their milking, Gwyllem had ridden up, somewhat the worse for liquor. Branwen had called him sot, had bidden him go home. "That I will do," said Gwyllem and suddenly caught up the girl. Alundyne sprang for him, and with clenched fist Gwyllem struck her twice full in the face, and, laughing, rode away with Branwen.

Richard made no observation. In silence he fetched his horse, and did not pause to saddle it. Quickly he rode to Gwyllem's house, and broke in the door. Against the farther wall stood lithe Branwen fighting silently: her breasts and shoulders were naked, where Gwyllem had torn away her garments. He wheedled, laughed, swore, and hiccoughed, turn by turn, but she was silent.

"On guard!" Richard barked.

Gwyllem wheeled. His head twisted toward his left shoulder, and one corner of his mouth convulsively snapped upward, so that his yellow teeth were bared. There was a knife at Richard's girdle, which he now unsheathed and flung away. He stepped eagerly toward the snarling Welshman, and with both hands seized the thick and hairy throat. What followed was brutal.

For many minutes Branwen stood with averted face, shuddering. She very dimly heard the sound of Gwyllem's impotent fists as they beat against the countenance and body of Richard, and she heard the thin, splitting, vicious noise of ripping cloth as Gwyllem clutched at Richard's tunic and tore it many times. Richard did not utter any articulate word, and Gwyllem could not, because Richard was strangling him.

There was entire silence for a heartbeat, and the thudding fall of something ponderous and limp.

"Come!" Richard said then.

Through the hut's twilight he came, as glorious in her eyes as Michael fresh from that primal battle with old Satan. Tall Richard came to her, his face all blood, and he lifted her in his arms lest Branwen's skirt be soiled by the demolished thing which sprawled across their path. She never spoke. She could not speak. In his arms she rode homeward, passive, and content. The horse trod with deliberation. In the east the young moon was taking heart as the darkness thickened, and innumerable stars awoke. Branwen noted these things incuriously.

Richard was horribly afraid. He it had been, in sober verity it had been Richard of Bordeaux, a person always able until to-day to encounter every emotion in a becoming spirit of levity, whom some monstrous force had seized, and had lifted, and had curtly utilized as its handiest implement. Richard had been, and in the moment had known himself to be, the thrown spear as yet in air, about to kill and quite powerless to refrain from killing. It was a full three minutes before he had got the better of his bewilderment and laughed, very softly, lest he disturb this Branwen, who was so near his heart. . . .

Next day she came to him at noon, bearing as always the little basket. It contained to-day a napkin, some garlic, a ham, and a small soft cheese; some shalots, salt, nuts, wild apples, lettuce, onions, and mushrooms.

"Behold a feast!" said Richard.

He noted then that she carried also a blue pitcher filled with thin wine, and two cups of oak-bark. She thanked him for last night's performance, and drank a mouthful of wine to his health.

"Decidedly, I shall be sorry to have done with shepherding," said Richard, as he ate.

Branwen answered, "I too shall be sorry, lord, when the masquerade is ended."

It seemed to Richard that she sighed, and he was the happier.

But he only shrugged. "I am the wisest person unhanged, since I comprehend my own folly. Yet I grant you that he was wise, too, the minstrel of old time that sang: 'Over wild lands and tumbling seas flits Love, at will, and maddens the heart and beguiles the senses of all whom he attacks, whether his quarry be some monster of the ocean, or some fierce denizen of the forest, or man; for thine, O Love, thine alone is the power to make playthings of us all.'"

"Your bard was wise, no doubt, yet it was not in such terms that Gwyllem sang of this passion. Lord," she demanded shyly, "how would you sing of love?"

Richard was replete and contented with the world. He took up the lute, in full consciousness that his compliance was in large part cenatory. "In courtesy, thus —"

Sang Richard:

"The gods in honor of fair Branwen's worth
Bore gifts to her: — and Jove, Olympus' lord,
Corule of Earth and Heaven did accord,
And Hermes brought that lyre he framed at birth,
And Venus her famed girdle (to engirth
A fairer beauty now), and Mars his sword,
And wrinkled Plutus half the secret hoard
And immemorial treasure of mid-earth; —

"And while the careful gods were pondering
Which of these goodly gifts the goodliest was,
Young Cupid came among them caroling
And proffered unto her a looking-glass,
Wherein she gazed, and saw the goodliest thing
That Earth had borne, and Heaven might not surpass."

"Three sounds are rarely heard," said Branwen; "and these sounds are the song of the birds of Rhiannon, an invitation to feast with a miser, and a speech of wisdom from the mouth of a Saxon. The song which you have made of courtesy is tinsel. Sing now in verity! "

Richard laughed, though he was sensibly nettled and perhaps a shade abashed. Presently he sang again.

Sang Richard:

" Catullus might have made of words that seek
With rippling sound, in soft recurrent ways,
The perfect song, or in remoter days
Theocritus have hymned you in glad Greek;
But I am not as they, — and dare not speak
Of you unworthily, and dare not praise
Perfection with imperfect roundelays,
And desecrate the prize I dare to seek.

" I do not woo you, then, by fashioning
Vext analogues 'twixt you and Guenevere,
Nor do I come with agile lips that bring
The sugared periods of a sonneteer,
And bring no more — but just with lips that cling
To yours, in murmuring, 'I love you, dear!' "

Richard had resolved that Branwen should believe him. Tinsel, indeed! then here was yet more tinsel which she must receive as gold. He was very angry, because his vanity had been hurt; and this pin-prick spurred him to a counterfeit so wholly convincing that he gloried in it. He was superb, and she believed him now; there was no questioning the fact, he saw it plainly, and with exultant cruelty. Then, curt as lightning, came the knowledge that what Branwen believed was the truth.

Richard had taken just two strides toward this fair girl. Branwen stayed motionless, her lips a little parted. The affairs of earth and heaven were motionless throughout the moment, attendant, it seemed to him; and to him, also, his life seemed like a wave that trembled now at full height. He was aware of a new world all made of beauty and of pity. Then the lute fell from his spread out hands, and Richard, sighing, shrugged.

"There is a task set me," he said, — "it is God's work, I think. But I do not know, — I only know that you are very beautiful, Branwen."

And he said also: "Go! For I have loved many women, and they have taught me that I have but to wheedle you and you, too, will yield! Yonder is God's work to be done; and within me frisks a commonwealth of devils. Child! child!" he cried, "I am, and I have always been, a coward, too timid to face life without reserve, and always I have laughed because I was afraid to concede that anything is serious. I, very certainly, must not begin by taking seriously the itch of an animal in its rutting season. So be off with you, my dear!"

For a long while Richard lay at his ease in the lengthening shadows of the afternoon.

"I am more or less in love with this girl. She thinks me an elderly imbecile with a flat and reedy singing-voice, and she is perfectly right. She has never even entertained the notion of loving me. That is well, for to-morrow, or, it may be, the day after to-morrow, we must part forever. I would not have the parting make her sorrowful, — or not, at least, too unalterably sorrowful. I would appreciate a moderate anguish. Still, it is very well that Branwen does not love me.

"Why, in Heaven's name, should she do anything so foolish? I am almost twice her age, an aging fellow now, battered and selfish and too indolent to love her — say, as Gwyllem loved her. I performed a good deed in killing that Gwyllem. I am profoundly glad I killed him, and I thoroughly enjoyed doing it; but, after all, the man loved her in his fashion, and to the uttermost reach of his gross nature. I love her in a rather more decorous and acceptable fashion, but only a half of me loves her. The other half of me remembers that I am aging; that I have been in love with a great many women; that Caradawc's hut is leaky; that, in fine, bodily comfort is the single luxury of which one never tires. I am a wholly contemptible creature, the empty scabbard of a man, precisely as Owain said."

This settled, Richard whistled to his dog.

The sun had set. There were no shadows anywhere as Richard and his sheep went homeward, but on every side the colors of the world were more somber. Twice his flock roused a covey of partridges which had settled for the night. The screech owl had come out of his hole, and bats were already blundering about, and the air was cooling. There was as yet but one star in the green and cloudless heaven, and this was very large, like a beacon: it appeared to him symbolical that he walked northerly, away from this star.

Next morning the Welshman came, and now the trap was ready for Henry of Lancaster.

It befell on this day also, about noon, that while Richard idly talked with Branwen a party of soldiers, some fifteen in number, rode down the river's bank from the ford above. Their leader paused, then gave an order. The men drew rein. He cantered forward.

"God give you joy, fair sir!" said Richard, when the cavalier was near him.

The newcomer raised his visor. "God give you eternal joy, my fair cousin," he said, "and very soon! Now send away this woman before that happens which must happen."

"Oh, but come now, Henry! Do you plan," said Richard, "to disfigure the stage of our quiet pastorals with murder?"

"I design my own preservation," King Henry answered, "for while you live my rule is insecure."

"I am sorry," Richard said, "that in part my blood is yours."

Twice he sounded his horn, and everywhere from rustling underwoods arose the half-naked Welshmen.

Said Richard: "You should read history more carefully, Cousin Henry. You might have profited, as I have done, by considering the trick which our grandfather, old Edward Longshanks, played on the French King, a good hundred years ago, at Mezelais. As matters stand, your men are one to ten. You are impotent. Now, now we balance our accounts! These persons here will first deal with your followers. Then they will conduct you to Glyndwyr, who has long desired to deal with you himself, in privacy, since that Whitmonday when you murdered his son."

The King began, "In mercy, sire — !" and Richard laughed a little, saying:

"That virtue is not overabundant among us of Oriander's blood, as we both know. No, cousin, Fate and Time are merry jesters. See, now, their latest mockery! You the King of England ride to Sycharth to your death, and I the tender of sheep depart into London, without any hindrance, to reign henceforward over these islands. To-morrow you are worm's-meat, Cousin Henry: to-morrow, as yesterday, I am King of England."

Then Branwen gave one sharp, brief cry, and Richard forgot all things saving this girl, and strode to her. He had caught up her hard, lithe hands; against his lips he strained them close and very close.

"Branwen — !" he said. His eyes devoured her.

She answered. "King of England! O fool that I have been to think you less!"

In a while Richard said: "Well, I at least am not fool enough to think of making you a king's whore. It is perhaps a pity that in these matters you virtuous women are not broad-minded. In any case, this defect in your nature now forces me to choose between possession of England and possession of a peasant wench. And I choose — upon the whole, — without any hesitating. Branwen, you must aid me to be more than King of England!"

Low and very low he spoke. He scoffed, as always: but long and very long he gazed at her, and he was not breathing adequately. Of what she thought I cannot tell you; but in Richard, howsoever desperately he clung to levity, there was no actual power of thought, only a great wonderment. Why, between this woman's love and aught else there was no choice for him, he knew upon a sudden. Perhaps he would thus worship her always, he reflected: and then again, perhaps he would be tired of her before long, just as all other persons seemed to abate in these infatuations: meanwhile, it was certain that he was very happy. No, he could not go back to the throne and to the little French girl who was in law his wife.

And, as if from an immense distance, came to Richard the dogged voice of Henry of Lancaster. "It is of common report in these islands that I have a better right to the throne than you have. As much was told our grandfather, King Edward of happy memory, when he educated you and had you acknowledged heir to the crown, but his love was so strong for his son the Prince of Wales that nothing could alter Lord Edward's purpose. And, indeed, if you had followed even the example of the Black Prince you might still have been our King; but you have always acted so contrarily to his admirable precedents as to occasion the rumor to be generally believed throughout England that you were not, after all, his son — "

Richard had turned impatiently. " For the love of Heaven, truncate your abominable periods. Be off with you! Yonder across that river is the throne of England, which you appear, through some lunacy, to consider a desirable possession. Take it, then; for, praise God! the sword has found its sheath."

The King answered: " I do not ask you to reconsider your dismissal, assuredly — Richard," he cried, a little shaken, " I perceive that until your death you will win contempt and love from every person."

" Yes, yes, for many years I have been the playmate of fine notions," Richard said; "but to-day I wash my hands, and set about another and more laudable business. I had dreamed certain dreams, indeed, — but what had I to do with all this strife between the devil and the tiger? No: Glyndwyr will set up Mortimer against you now; and you two must fight it out. I am no more his tool, and no more your enemy, my cousin — Henry," he said with quickening voice, "there was a time when we were boys and played together, and there was no hatred between us, and I regret that time!"

"As God lives, I too regret that time!" the bluff, squinting King replied. He stared at Richard for a while. "Dear fool," King Henry said, "there is no man in all the world but hates me saving only you, who have the most reason for hatred."

Then the King clapped spurs to his horse and rode away.

Thereafter Richard dismissed his wondering marauders. Now he and Branwen were alone, and a little troubled as to that oncoming moment when their eyes must meet.

So Richard laughed. "Praise God!" cried out this landless and tattered Richard, "I am the unthriftiest fool unhanged!"

Branwen answered him: "I am the happier for your folly. I am the happiest of God's creatures."

But Richard disputed this. "Faith of a gentleman!" he declared, "but you are not the happiest of God's creatures, and of this fact I happen to be quite certain."

Their lips met then and afterward their eyes; and each of these ragged peasants was too glad for laughter.

IX

THE STORY OF THE NAVARRESE

" J'ay en mon cueur joyeusement
Escript, afin que ne l'oublie,
Ce refrain qu'ayme chierement, C'estes vous de qui suis amye."

The Ninth Novel. — Jehane of Navarre, after a withstanding of all other assaults, in a long duel, wherein time and common sense are flouted, and kingdoms are shaken, is dethroned and recompensed by an enduring lunacy.

The Story of the Navarrese

IN the year of grace 1386, upon the feast of Saint Bartholomew (thus Nicolas begins), came to the Spanish coast Messire Peyre de Lesnerac, in a warship sumptuously furnished and manned by many persons of dignity and wealth, in order suitably to escort the Princess Jehane into Brittany, where she was to marry the Duke of that province. There were now rejoicings throughout Navarre, in which the Princess took but a nominal part and young Antoine Riczi none at all.

This Antoine Riczi came to Jehane, with the falling of that August twilight, in the hedged garden. "King's daughter!" he sadly greeted her. "Duchess of Brittany! Countess of Rougemont! Lady of Nantes and of Guerrand! of Rais and of Toufon and Guerche!"

She answered, "No, my dearest, — I am your Jehane, whose only title is the Constant Lover."

In the green twilight, lit as yet by one low-hanging star alone, their lips and their desperate young bodies clung, now, it might be, for the last time.

By and by the girl spoke. Her soft mouth was lax and tremulous, and her gray eyes were more brilliant than the star yonder. The boy's arms were about her, so that neither could be quite unhappy, yet.

"Friend," said Jehane, "I have no choice. I must become the wife of this Montfort. I think I shall die presently. I have prayed God that I may die before they bring me to the dotard's bed."

Young Riczi held her now in an embrace more brutal. "This woman is mine!" he snarled toward the obscure heavens.

"— Yet it may be I must live. Friend, the man is very old. Is it wicked to think of that? For I cannot but think of his great age, and of how inevitably such old persons die."

Then Riczi answered: "My desires — may God forgive me! — have clutched like starving persons at that sorry sustenance. Friend! ah, fair, sweet friend! the man is human and must die, but love, we read, is immortal. I am wishful to kill myself, Jehane. But, oh, Jehane! dare you to bid me live?"

"Friend, as you love me, I entreat you to live. Friend, I crave of the Eternal Father that if I falter in my love for you I may be denied even the one bleak night of ease which Judas knows."

The girl did not weep; dry-eyed she winged a perfectly sincere prayer toward incorruptible saints. Riczi was to remember the fact, and through long years of severance.

For even now, as Riczi went away from Jehane, a shrill singing-girl was rehearsing, yonder behind the yew hedge, the song which this girl was to sing at Jehane's bridal feast.

Sang this joculatrix:

"When the Morning broke before us
Came the wayward Three astraying,
Chattering in babbling chorus,
(Obloquies of Æther saying),— Hoidens that, at pegtop playing,
Flung their Top where yet it whirls
Through the coil of clouds unstaying,
For the Fates are captious girls!"

And upon the next day Lesnerac bore young Jehane from Pampeluna and presently to Saillé, where old Jehan the Brave took her to wife. She lived as a queen, but she was a woman of infrequent laughter.

She had Duke Jehan's adoration, and his barons' obeisancy, and his villagers applauded her passage with stentorian shouts. She passed interminable days amid bright curious arrasses and trod listlessly over pavements strewn with flowers. She had fiery-hearted jewels, and shimmering purple cloths, and much furniture adroitly carven, and many tapestries of Samarcand and Baldach upon which were embroidered, by brown fingers that time had turned long ago to Asian dust, innumerable asps and deer and phœnixes and dragons and all the motley inhabitants of air and of the thicket: but her memories, too, she had, and for a dreary while she got no comfort because of them. Then ambition quickened.

Young Antoine Riczi likewise nursed his wound as best he might; but at the end of the second year after Jehane's wedding his uncle, the Vicomte de Montbrison — a gaunt man, with preoccupied and troubled eyes, — had summoned Antoine into Lyonnois, and, after appropriate salutation, had informed the lad that, as the Vicomte's heir, Antoine was to marry the Demoiselle Gerberge de Nérac upon the ensuing Michaelmas.

"That I may not do," said Antoine Riczi; and, since a chronicler who would tempt fortune should never stretch too thin the fabric of the wares which he peddles, I merely tell you these two dwelt together at Montbrison for a decade: and the Vicomte swore at his nephew and predicted this or that disastrous destination as often as Antoine declined to marry the latest of his uncle's candidates, — in whom the Vicomte was of an astonishing fertility.

In the year of grace 1401 came the belated news that Duke Jehan the Brave had closed his final day.

"You will be leaving me!" the Vicomte growled; "now, in my decrepitude, you will be leaving me! It is abominable, and I shall in all likelihood disinherit you this very night."

"Yet it is necessary," Riczi answered; and, filled with no unhallowed joy, he rode for Vannes, in Brittany, where the Duchess-Regent held her court.

Dame Jehane had within that fortnight put aside her mourning. She sat beneath a green canopy, gold-fringed and powdered with many golden stars, when Riczi came again to her, and the rising saps of spring were exercising their august and formidable influence. She sat alone, by prearrangement, to one end of the high-ceiled and radiant apartment; midway in the hall some twenty of her lords and ladies were gathered about a saltatrice and a jongleur, who were diverting the courtiers, to the mincing accompaniment of a lute; but Jehane sat apart from these, frail, and splendid with many jewels, and a little sad.

And Antoine Riczi found no power of speech within him at the first. Silent he stood before her, now that his lifelong love had come at last to its reward, while meltingly the jongleur sang about the sad death of Madame Cressida of Troy.

"Jehane!" said Antoine Riczi, in a while, "have you, then, forgotten, O Jehane?"

The resplendent woman had not moved at all. It was as though she were some tinted and lavishly adorned statue of barbaric heathenry, and he her postulant; and her large eyes appeared to judge an immeasurable path, beyond him. Now her lips fluttered somewhat.

"I am the Duchess of Brittany," she said, in the phantom of a voice. "I am the Countess of Rougemont. The Lady of Nantes and of Guerrand! of Rais and of Toufon and Guerche! . . . Jehane is dead."

The man had drawn one audible breath. "You are that Jehane whose only title is the Constant Lover!"

"Friend, the world smirches us," she said, half pleadingly. "I have tasted too deeply of wealth and power. I am drunk with a deadly wine, and ever I thirst — I thirst —"

"Jehane, do you remember that May morning in Pampeluna when first I kissed you, and about us sang many birds? Then as now you wore a gown of green, Jehane."

"Friend, I have swayed kingdoms since."

"Jehane, do you remember that August twilight in Pampeluna when last I kissed you? Then as now you wore a gown of green, Jehane."

"But I wore no such chain as this about my neck," the woman answered, and she lifted a huge golden collar garnished with emeralds and sapphires and with many pearls. "Friend, the chain is heavy, yet I lack the will to cast it off. I lack the will, Antoine."

Now with a sudden shout of mirth her courtiers applauded that dance in which the saltatrice was now gaily posturing.

"King's daughter!" said Riczi then; "O perilous merchandise! a god came to me and a sword had pierced his breast. He touched the gold hilt of it and said, 'Take back your weapon.' I answered, 'I do not know you.' 'I am Youth,' he said; 'take back your weapon.'"

"It is true," she responded, "it is lamentably true that after to-night we are as different persons, you and I."

He said: "Jehane, do you not love me any longer? Remember old years, and do not break your oath with me, Jehane, since God abhors nothing so much as unfaith. For your own sake, Jehane, — ah, no, not for your sake nor for mine, but for the sake of that blithe Jehane whom, so you tell me, time has slain!"

Once or twice she blinked, as if dazzled by a light of intolerable splendor, but otherwise she stayed rigid. "You have dared, messire, to confront me with the golden-hearted, clean-eyed Navarrese that once was I! and I requite." The austere woman rose. "Messire, you swore to me, long since, eternal service. I claim my right in domnei. Yonder — gray-bearded, the man in black and silver — is the Earl of Worcester, the King of England's ambassador, in common with whom the wealthy dowager of Brittany has signed a certain contract. Do you go with Worcester into England, as my proxy, and in that island, as my proxy, become the wife of the King of England! Messire, your audience is done."

Riczi said this: "Can you hurt me any more, Jehane? — no, even in hell they cannot hurt me now. Yet I, at least, keep faith, and in your face I fling faith like a glove, — old-fashioned, it may be, but clean, — and I will go, Jehane."

Her heart raged. "Poor, glorious fool!" she thought; "had you but the wit even now to use me brutally, even now to drag me from this daïs! —"

Instead, he went away from her smilingly, treading through the hall with many affable salutations, while the jongleur sang.

Sang the jongleur:

"There is a land those hereabout
Ignore . . . Its gates are barred
By Titan twins, named Fear and Doubt.
These mercifully guard
That land we seek — the land so fair! —
And all the fields thereof,
Where daffodils flaunt everywhere
And ouzels chant of love, —
Lest we attain the Middle-Land,
Whence clouded well-springs rise,
And vipers from a slimy strand
Lift glittering cold eyes.

"Now, the parable all may understand,
And surely you know the name of the land!
Ah, never a guide or ever a chart
May safely lead you about this land, —
The Land of the Human Heart!"

And the following morning, being duly empowered, Antoine Riczi sailed for England in company with the Earl of Worcester; and upon Saint

Richard's day the next ensuing was, at Eltham, as proxy of Jehane, married in his own person to the bloat King Henry, the fourth of that name to reign. This king was that same squinting Harry of Derby (called also Henry of Lancaster and Bolingbroke) who stole his cousin's crown, and about whom I have told you in the preceding story. First, King Henry placed the ring on Riczi's finger, and then spoke Antoine Riczi, very loud and clear:

"I, Antoine Riczi, — in the name of my worshipful lady, Dame Jehane, the daughter of Messire Charles until lately King of Navarre, the Duchess of Brittany and the Countess of Rougemont, — do take you, Lord Henry of Lancaster, King of England and in title of France, and Lord of Ireland, to be my husband; and thereto I, Antoine Riczi, in the spirit of my said lady," — the speaker paused here to regard the gross hulk of masculinity before him, and Riczi smiled, — "in very precisely the spirit of my said lady, I plight you my troth."

Afterward the King made him presents of some rich garments of scarlet trimmed with costly furs, and of four silk belts studded with silver and gold, and with valuable clasps, of which the owner might well be proud; and Riczi returned to Lyonnois.

"Depardieux!" his uncle said; "so you return alone!"

"I return as did Prince Troilus, after Cressida had betrayed him," — said Riczi, — "to boast to you of liberal entertainment in the tent of that squinting Diomede who now tups my Cressida."

"You are certainly an inveterate fool," the Vicomte considered, after a prolonged appraisal of his face, "since there is always a deal of other pink-and-white flesh as yet unmortgaged — Boy with my brother's eyes!" the Vicomte said, in another voice; "I have heard of the task put upon you: and I would that I were God to punish as is fitting this harlot's mockery of her servant in domnei. But you are welcome home, my lad."

So these two abode together at Montbrison for a long time, and in the purlieus of that place hunted and hawked, and made sonnets once in a while, and they read aloud from old romances some five days out of the seven. Riczi had become famous among persons of gentle condition because of the task which his lady had put upon him: it had made him mythical: and he got a great deal of pleasure out of his misery, along with the most desperate verses about Jehane and his hatred of her.

The verses of Riczi were in the year of grace 1410 made public, not without acclamation; and thereafter the stripling Comte de Charolais, future heir to all Burgundy and a zealous patron of rhyme, was often at Montbrison, and there conceived for Antoine Riczi such admiration as was possible to a very young man only.

In the year of grace 1412 the Vicomte, being then bedridden, died without any disease and of no malady save the inherencies of his age. "My lad, I entreat of you," he said, at the last, "that always you use as touchstone the brave deed you did at Eltham. It is necessary for a gentleman to serve his lady according to her commandments, but you performed the most absurd and the most cruel task which any woman ever imposed upon her lover and servitor in domnei. I laugh at you, and I envy you."

Thus he died, about Martinmas.

Now was Antoine Riczi a powerful baron, but he got no comfort of his lordship, because that old incendiary, the King of Darkness, daily added fuel to a smouldering sorrow until grief quickened into vaulting flames of wrath and of disgust.

"What now avail my riches?" said the Vicomte. "How much wealthier was I when I was loved, and was myself an eager lover! I relish no other pleasures than those of love. I am Love's sot, drunk with a deadly wine, poor fool, and ever I thirst. All my chattels and my acres appear to me to be bright vapors, and the more my dominion and my power increase, the more rancorously does my heart sustain its bitterness over having been robbed of that fair merchandise which is now a part of the King of England's bed-furniture. To hate her is scant comfort, and to despise her none at all, since it follows that I who am unable to forget the wanton am even more to be despised than she is. I will cease denouncing her in verse, I will annoy her in some more practical way. I will go into England and execute what mischief I may against her."

The new Vicomte de Montbrison set forth for Paris, first to do homage for his fief, and secondly to be accredited for some plausible mission into England. But in Paris he got disquieting news. Jehane's husband was dead, and her stepson, Sire Henry, the fifth monarch of that name to reign in Britain, had invaded France to support preposterous claims which the man advanced to the crown of that latter kingdom: and as the earth is altered by the advent of winter, so was the appearance of France transformed by King Henry's coming, and everywhere the nobles were stirred up to arms, the castles were closed, the huddled cities were fortified, and on every side arose entrenchments.

Thus, through this sudden turn, was the new Vicomte, the dreamer and the recluse, caught up by the career of events, as a straw is borne away by a torrent, when the French lords marched with their vassals to Harfleur, where they were soundly drubbed by the King of England; as afterward at Agincourt.

But in the year of grace 1417 there was a breathing space for discredited France, and presently the Vicomte de Montbrison was sent into England, as ambassador. He got in London a fruitless audience of King Henry, whose demands were such as rendered a renewal of the war inevitable. He afterward got, in the month of April, about the day of Palm Sunday, at the Queen's dower-palace of Havering-Bower, an interview with Queen Jehane, to whom her second husband had left this palace, and two other palaces, and much wealth of every kind.[1]

A curled pert page took the Vicomte into a chamber with painted walls, profusely lighted by the sun, where Jehane was sitting alone, by prearrangement, and was pretending to weave a tapestry. When the page had gone, she rose and cast aside the shuttle, and then with a glad and wordless cry stumbled toward the Vicomte.

"Madame and Queen —!" he coldly said.

His judgment found in her a quite ordinary, frightened woman, aging now, but still very handsome in these black and shimmering gold robes; but all his other faculties found her desirable: and with a contained hatred he had perceived, as if by the terse illumination of a thunderbolt, that he could never love any woman save the woman whom he most despised.

She said: "I had forgotten. I had remembered only you, Antoine, and Navarre, and the clean-eyed Navarrese —" Now for a little, Jehane paced the gleaming and sun-drenched apartment as a bright

[1] Nicolas unaccountably omits to mention that, over and above becoming the wealthiest person in the kingdom, Jehane had also, during the French wars, governed entire England as her stepson's Regent, — for all that this very fact, as you may observe later, is the pivot of the present story.

leopardess might tread her cage. Then she wheeled. "Friend, I think that God Himself has deigned to avenge you. My reign has been all misery. First Hotspur, then prim Worcester harried us. Came Glyndwyr afterward to prick us with his devils' horns. Followed the dreary years that linked me to the rotting corpse which God's leprosy devoured while the poor furtive thing yet moved, and endured its share in the punishment of Manuel's poisonous blood. All misery, Antoine! And now I live beneath a sword."

"You have earned no more," he said. "You have earned no more, O Jehane! whose only title is the Constant Lover!"

She came uncertainly toward him, as though he had been some not implacable knave with a bludgeon. "— For the King hates me," she plaintively said, "and I live beneath a sword. The big, fierce-eyed boy has hated me from the first, for all his lip-courtesy. And now he lacks the money to pay his troops, and I am the wealthiest person within his realm. I am a woman and alone in a foreign land. So I must wait, and wait, and wait, Antoine, till he devises some trumped-up accusation. Friend, I live as did Saint Damoclus, beneath a sword. Antoine!" she wailed, — for now the pride of Queen Jehane was shattered utterly, — "I am held as a prisoner for all that my chains are of gold."

"Yet once," he returned, "you desired to become the wealthiest person in this realm: and because of that desire you cast me off at Vannes. To-day, as you tell me, this wealth has become your danger, and you are held in golden chains: yet formerly, madame, you did not dislike the metal which is the substance of all crowns."

And now the woman lifted toward him her massive golden necklace, garnished with emeralds and sapphires and with many pearls, and in the sunlight these gems seemed tawdry things. "Friend, the chain is heavy, and I lack the power to cast it off. The Navarrese we know of wore no such perilous fetters. Ah, you should have mastered me at Vannes. You could have done so, very easily. But you only talked, — oh, Mary pity us! you only talked! — and I could find only a servant where I had sore need to find a master. Let all women pity me! "

But now came many armed soldiers into the apartment. With spirit Queen Jehane turned to meet them, and you saw that she was of royal blood, for the pride of many emperors blazed and informed her body as light occupies a lantern.

"At last you come for me, messieurs? "

"Whereas," the leader of these soldiers read from a parchment, — "whereas the King's stepmother, Queen Jehane, is accused by certain persons of an act of witchcraft that with diabolical and subtle methods wrought privily to destroy the King, the said Dame Jehane is by the King committed (all her attendants being removed) to the custody of Sir John Pelham, who will, at the King's pleasure, confine her within Pevensey Castle, there to be kept under Sir John's control: the lands and other properties of the said Dame Jehane being hereby forfeit to the King, whom God preserve! "

"Harry of Monmouth!" said Jehane, — "ah, my tall stepson, could I but come to you, very quietly, with a knife — ! " She shrugged her shoulders, and the gold about her person glittered in the sunlight. "Witchcraft! ohimé, that is a crime which no one can disprove. Friend, now are you avenged the more abundantly."

"Young Riczi is avenged," the Vicomte said; "and I came hither desiring vengeance."

She wheeled, a lithe flame (he thought) of splendid fury. "And in the gutter Jehane dares say what Queen Jehane upon the throne might never say. Had I reigned all these years as mistress not of England but of Europe, — had nations wheedled me in the place of barons, — young Riczi had been none the less avenged. Bah! what do these so little persons matter? Do you take now your petty vengeance! drink deep of it! and know that always within my heart the Navarrese has lived to shame me! Know that to-day you despise Jehane, the purchased woman! and that Jehane loves you! and that the love of proud Jehane creeps like a beaten cur toward your feet, in the sight of common persons! and do you make yet more of your silly verses about it, — you half-man, you word-milliner! "

"Into England I came desiring vengeance — Apples of Sodom! O bitter fruit!" the Vicomte thought; "O fitting harvest of a fool's assiduous husbandry! "

They took her from him: and that afternoon, after long meditation, the Vicomte de Montbrison entreated a second private audience of King Henry, and readily obtained it. "Unhardy is unseely," the Vicomte said at this interview's conclusion. The tale tells that the Vicomte returned to France and within this realm assembled all such lords as the abuses of the Queen-Regent Isabeau had more notoriously dissatisfied.

The Vicomte had upon occasion an invaluable power of speech; when the lady of his faithful heart described him as a word-milliner, it may be that she spoke without actual injustice: but now, so great was the devotion of love's dupe, so heartily, so hastily, did he design to remove the discomforts of Queen Jehane, that now his eloquence was twin to Belial's insidious talking when that fiend tempts us to some proud iniquity.

Then presently these lords had sided with King Henry, as did the Vicomte de Montbrison, in open field. Next, as luck would have it, Jehan Sans-Peur was slain at Montereau; and a little later the new Duke of Burgundy, who loved the Vicomte as he loved no other man, had shifted his coat, forsaking France. These treacheries brought down the wavering scales of warfare, suddenly, with an aweful clangor; and now in France all persons of gentle condition spoke of the Vicomte de Montbrison no longer as a famous martyr to domnei, but, rather, as they would speak of Ganelon or of Iscariot; and in every market-place was King Henry proclaimed as governor of the realm.

Meantime Queen Jehane had been conveyed to prison and lodged therein. She had the liberty of a tiny garden, high-walled, and of two scantily furnished chambers. The brace of hard-featured females whom Pelham had provided for the Queen's attendance might speak to her of nothing that occurred without the gates of Pevensey; and she saw no other persons save her confessor, a triple-chinned Dominican: had men already lain Jehane within the massive and gilded coffin of a queen the outer world would have made in her ears as faint a turbulence.

But in the year of grace 1422, upon the feast of Saint Bartholomew, and about vespers, — for thus it wonderfully fell out, — one of those grim attendants brought to her the first man, save the fat confessor, whom the Queen had seen within five years. The proud, frail woman looked, and what she saw was the inhabitant of all her dreams.

Said Jehane: "This is ill done. Time has avenged you. Be contented with that knowledge, and, for Heaven's sake, do not endeavor to moralize over the ruin which Heaven has made, and justly made, of Queen Jehane, as I can well perceive you intend to do, in yet some more of your silly verses."

She leaned backward in the chair, very coarsely clad in brown, but knowing that her coloring was excellent, that she had miraculously preserved her figure, and that she did not look her real age by a good ten years. Such reflections beget spiritual comfort even in a prison.

"Friend," the lean-faced man now said, "I do not come with such intent, as my mission will readily attest, nor to any ruin, as your mirror will attest. Instead, madame, I come as the emissary of King Henry, now dying at Vincennes, and with letters to the lords and bishops of his council. Dying, the man restores to you your liberty and your dower-lands, your bed and all your movables, and six gowns of such fashion and such color as you may elect."

Then with hurried speech he told her of five years' events: of how within that period King Henry had conquered France, and had married the French King's daughter, Dame Katharine of Valois, and had begotten a boy who would presently inherit the united realms of France and England, since in the supreme hour of triumph King Henry had been stricken with a mortal sickness, and now lay dying, or perhaps already dead, at Vincennes; and of how with his penultimate breath the prostrate conqueror had restored to Queen Jehane all properties and all honors which she formerly enjoyed.

"I shall once more be Regent," the woman said, when the Vicomte had made an end; "Antoine, I shall presently be Regent both of France and of England, since Dame Katharine is but a child." Jehane stood motionless save for the fine hands that plucked the air. "Mistress of Europe! absolute mistress, and with an infant ward! now, may God have mercy on my unfriends, for they will soon perceive great need of it!"

"Yet was mercy ever the prerogative of royal persons," the Vicomte suavely said, "and the Navarrese we know of was both royal and very merciful, O Constant Lover."

The speech was as a whiplash. Abruptly suspicion kindled in her shrewd gray eyes.

"Harry of Monmouth feared neither man nor God. It needed more than any deathbed repentance to frighten him into restoring my liberty." There was a silence. "How does it happen, friend, that you, a Frenchman, come to me as the emissary of King Henry who has devastated France! are there no English lords, then, left alive of his army?"

The Vicomte de Montbrison said, "There is at all events no person better fitted to patch up this dishonorable business of your captivity, in which no clean man would care to meddle."

She appraised this, and said with entire irrelevance:

"The world has smirched you, somehow. At last you have done something save consider how badly I treated you. I praise God, Antoine, for it brings you nearer."

He told her all. King Henry, it appeared, had dealt with him at Havering in perfect frankness. The King needed money for his wars in France, and, short of seizing the Queen Dowager's properties, had exhausted every resource. "And France I mean to have," the King had said. "I must cast out the Valois from the throne they have defiled, as Darius cast out Belshazzar, for such is the desire and the intent of God."—"That, sire," the Vicomte had submitted, "is nonsense."—"In private it may sound like nonsense," the King had assented, "but in the rogueries of public life these Biblical phrases are necessary. Now, then, Messire de Montbrison, the world knows you enjoy the peculiar favor of the Comte de Charolais. So do you get me an alliance with Burgundy against my imbecile brother of France; that will serve me even better than money; and my stepmother can thus have back her money and her liberty also. There you have my price."

"And this price I paid," the Vicomte sternly said, "for 'Unhardy is unseely,' Satan whispered, and I knew that Duke Philippe trusted me. Yea, all Burgundy I marshaled under your stepson's banner, and for three years I fought beneath his loathed banner, until at Troyes we had trapped and conquered the last loyal Frenchman. To-day in France my title is forfeited; my lands are confiscated; and there is no honest Frenchman but spits upon my name. All infamy I come to you for this last time, Jehane! as a man already dead I come to you, Jehane, for in France they thirst to murder me, and England has no further need of Montbrison, her blunted and her filthy instrument! "

The woman nodded here. " You have set my thankless service above your life, above your honor. I find the rhymester glorious and very vile."

" All vile," he answered; " and outworn! King's daughter, I swore to you, long since, eternal service. Of love I freely gave you yonder in Navarre, as yonder at Eltham I performed the most cruel task which any lady ever put upon her servant in domnei. Yet I, at least, keep faith, and in your face I fling faith like a glove, — outworn, it may be, and God knows, unclean! Yet I, at least, keep faith! Lands and wealth have I given up for you, O king's daughter, and life itself have I given you, and lifelong service have I given you, and all that I had save honor; and at the last I give you honor, too. Now let the naked fool depart, Jehane, for he has nothing more to give."

While the Vicomte de Montbrison spoke thus, she had leaned upon the sill of an open casement. " Indeed, it had been better," she said, still with her face averted, and gazing downward upon the tree tops which showed beneath this high-set window, " it had been far better had we never met. For this love of ours has proven a tyrannous and evil lord. I have had everything, and upon each feast of will and sense which the world afforded me this love has swept down, like a harpy — was it not a harpy you called the bird in that old poem of yours? — to rob me of delight. And you have had nothing, for this love has pilfered you of life, giving you only your dreams and your silly rhymes in exchange, my poor Antoine, and love has led you at the last into infamy. We are as God made us, and — I may not understand why He permits this despotism."

Thereafter, somewhere below, a peasant sang as he passed supperward through the green twilight, lit as yet by one low-hanging star alone.

Sang the peasant:

"King Jesus hung upon the Cross,
'And have ye sinned?' quo' He, —
'Nay, Dysmas, 'tis no honest loss
When Satan cogs the dice ye toss,
And thou shalt sup with Me, —
Sedebis apud angelos.
Quia amavisti!'

"At Heaven's Gate was Heaven's Queen,
'And have ye sinned?' quo' She, —
'And would I hold him worth a bean
That durst not seek, because unclean,

My cleansing charity? —
Speak thou that wast the Magdalene,
Quia amavisti!' "

"It may be that in some sort the jingle answers me!" then said Jehane; and she began with an odd breathlessness, "Friend, when King Henry dies, — and even now he dies, — shall I not as Regent possess such power as no woman has ever wielded in Europe? can aught prevent this?"

"It is true," he answered. "You leave this prison to rule over England again, and over conquered France as well, and naught can prevent it."

"Unless, friend, I were wedded to a Frenchman. Then would the stern and jealous English lords never permit that I have any finger in government." She came to him with conspicuous deliberation and rested her hands upon his breast. "Friend, I am weary of these tinsel splendors. What are this England and this France to me, who crave the real kingdom?"

Her mouth was tremulous and lax, and her gray eyes were more brilliant than the star yonder. The man's arms were about her, and of the man's face I cannot tell you.

"King's daughter! mistress of half Europe! I am a beggar, an outcast, as a leper among honorable persons."

But it was as though he had not spoken. "Friend, it was for this I have outlived these garish, fevered years, it was this which made me glad when I was a child and laughed without knowing why. That I might to-day give up this so great power for love of you, my all-incapable and soiled Antoine, was, as I now know, the end to which the Eternal Father created me. For, look you, to surrender absolute dominion over half Europe is a sacrifice. Do you assure me that it is a sacrifice, Antoine! O glorious fool, delude me into the belief that I surrender much in choosing you! Nay, I know it is as nothing beside what you have given up for me, yet, even so,"— Jehane said, tenderly, with a half-rueful smiling, —"this half of Europe is all that I possess."

He had drawn a deep-lunged breath which seemed to inform his being with indomitable vigor; and grief and doubtfulness went quite away from this incorrigible poet. Then the Vicomte said:

"Love leads us, madame; and through the sunlight of the world Love leads us, and through the filth of it Love leads us, but always in the end, if we but follow without swerving, Love leads upward. Yet, O God upon the Cross! Thou that in the article of death didst pardon Dysmas! as what maimed warriors of life, as what bemired travelers in muddied byways, must we presently come to Thee!"

"Ah, but we will come hand in hand," she answered; "and He will comprehend."

THE STORY OF THE FOX-BRUSH

"Dame serez de mon cueur, sans debat,
Entierement, jusques mort me consume.
Laurier soüef qui pour mon droit combat,
Olivier franc, m'ostant toute amertume."

The Tenth Novel. — Katharine of Valois is loved by a huntsman, and loves him greatly; then finds him, to her horror, an impostor; and for a sufficient reason consents to marry quite another person, not all unwillingly.

The Story of the Fox-Brush

IN the year of grace 1417, about Martinmas (thus Nicolas begins), Queen Isabeau fled with her daughter the Lady Katharine to Chartres. There the Queen was met by the Duke of Burgundy, and these two laid their heads together to such good effect that presently they got back into Paris, and in its public places massacred some three thousand Armagnacs. That, however, is a matter which touches history: the root of our concernment is that, when the Queen and the Duke rode off to attend to this butcher's business, the Lady Katharine was left behind in the Convent of Saint Scholastica, which then stood upon the outskirts of Chartres, in the bend of the Eure just south of that city. She dwelt for a year in this well-ordered place.

There one finds her upon the day of the decollation of Saint John the Baptist, the fine August morning that starts the tale. Katharine the Fair, men called her, with considerable show of reason. She was very tall, and slim as a rush. Her eyes were large and black, having an extreme luster, like the gleam of undried ink, — a luster at some times uncanny. Her abundant hair, too, was black, and to-day seemed doubly somber by contrast with the gold netting which confined it. Her lips were scarlet, all curves, and her complexion was famous for its brilliancy; only a precisian would have objected that she possessed the Valois nose, long and thin and somewhat unduly overhanging the mouth.

To-day as she came through the orchard, crimson-garbed, she paused with lifted eyebrows. Beyond the orchard wall there was a hodgepodge of noises, among which a nice ear might distinguish the clatter of hoofs, a yelping and scurrying, and a contention of soft bodies, and above all a man's voice commanding the turmoil. She was seventeen, so she climbed into the crotch of an apple tree and peered over the wall.

He was in rusty brown and not unshabby; but her regard swept over this to his face, and there noted how his eyes shone like blue winter stars under the tumbled yellow hair, and noted the flash of his big teeth as he swore between them. He held a dead fox by the brush, which he was cutting off; two hounds, lank and wolfish, were scaling his huge body in frantic attempts to get at the carrion. A horse grazed close at hand.

So for a heartbeat she saw him. Then he flung the tailless body to the hounds, and in the act spied two black eyes peeping through the apple leaves.

He laughed, all mirth to the heels of him. "Mademoiselle, I fear we have disturbed your devotions. But I had not heard that it was a Benedictine custom to rehearse aves in tree tops." Then, as she leaned forward, both elbows resting more comfortably upon the wall, and thereby disclosing her slim body among the foliage like a crimson flower green-calyxed, he said: " You are not a nun — Blood of God! you are the Princess Katharine! "

The nuns, her present guardians, would have declared the ensuing action horrific, for Katharine smiled frankly at him and asked how could he thus recognize her at one glance.

He answered slowly: " I have seen your portrait. Hah, your portrait! " he jeered, head flung back, and big teeth glinting in the sunlight. " There is a painter who merits crucifixion."

She considered this indicative of a cruel disposition, but also of a fine taste in the liberal arts. Aloud she stated:

" You are not a Frenchman, messire. I do not understand how you can have seen my portrait."

The man stood for a moment twiddling the fox-brush. " I am a harper, my Princess. I have visited the courts of many kings, though never that of France. I perceive I have been woefully unwise."

This trenched upon impudence, — the look of his eyes, indeed, carried it well past the frontier, — but she found the statement interesting. Straightway she touched the kernel of those fear-blurred legends whispered about Dom Manuel's reputed descendants.

" You have, then, seen the King of England? "

"Yes, highness."

"Is it true that in him, the devil blood of Oriander has gone mad, and that he eats children, — like Agrapard and Angoulaffre of the Broken Teeth?"

His gaze widened. "I have heard a large deal of scandal concerning young Harry of Monmouth. But, certainly, I never heard that."

Katharine settled back, luxuriously, in the crotch of the apple tree. "Tell me about him!"

Composedly he sat down upon the grass and began to acquaint her with his knowledge and opinions concerning Henry, the fifth of that name to reign in England, and the son of that squinting Harry of Derby about whom I have told you so much before.

Katharine punctuated the harper's discourse with eager questionings, which are not absolutely to our purpose. In the main, this harper thought the man now buffeting France a just king, and he had heard, when the crown was laid aside, Sire Henry was sufficiently jovial, and even prankish. The harper educed anecdotes. He considered that the King would manifestly take Rouen, which the insatiable man was now besieging. Was the King in treaty for the hand of the Infanta of Aragon? Yes, he undoubtedly was.

Katharine sighed her pity for this ill-starred woman. "And now tell me about yourself!"

He was, it appeared, Alain Maquedonnieux, a harper by vocation, and by birth a native of Ireland. Beyond the fact that it was a savage kingdom adjoining Cataia, Katharine knew nothing about Ireland. The harper assured her that in this she was misinformed, since the kings of England claimed Ireland as an appanage, though the Irish themselves were of two minds as to the justice of these pretensions: all in all, he considered that Ireland belonged to Saint Patrick, and that the holy man had never accredited a vicar.

"— Doubtless, by the advice of God," Alain said: "for I have read in Master Roger de Wendover's Chronicles of how at the dread day of judgment all the Irish are to muster before the high and pious Patrick, as their liege-lord and father in the spirit, and are by him to be conducted into the presence of the Supreme Father; and of how, by virtue of Saint Patrick's request, all the Irish will die seven years to an hour before the second coming of Christ, in order to give the blessed Saint sufficient time to marshal his company, which is considerable."

Katharine admitted the convenience of this arrangement, as well as the neglect of her education.

Alain gazed up at her for a long while, as if in reflection, and presently said, "Doubtless the Lady Heleine of Argos also was thus starry-eyed and found in books less diverting reading than in the faces of men."

It flooded Katharine's cheeks with a livelier hue, but did not vex her irretrievably: if she chose to read this man's face, the meaning was plain enough.

I give you the gist of their talk, and that, in all conscience, is trivial. But it was a day when one entered love's wardship with a plunge, instead of, in more modern fashion, venturing forward bit by bit, as though love were so much cold water. They talked for a long while, with laughter mutually provoked and shared, with divers eloquent and dangerous pauses. The harper sprawled upon the ground, the Princess leaned over the wall; but to all intent they sat together upon the loftiest turret of Paradise, and it was a full two hours before Katharine hinted at departure.

Alain rose, approaching the wall. "To-morrow I ride for Milan to take service with Duke Filippo. I had broken my journey these three days past at Châteauneuf yonder, where this fox has been harrying my host's chickens. To-day I went out to slay him, and he led me, his murderer, to the fairest lady earth may boast. Do you not think that, in returning good for evil, this fox was a true Christian, my Princess?"

Katharine said: "I lament his martyrdom. Farewell, Messire Alain! And since chance brought you hither —"

"Destiny brought me hither," Alain affirmed, a mastering hunger in his eyes. "Destiny has been kind; I shall make a prayer to her that she continue so." But when Katharine demanded what this prayer would be, Alain shook his tawny head. "By and you shall know, highness, but not now. I return to Châteauneuf on certain necessary businesses; tomorrow I set out at cockcrow for Milan and the Visconti's livery. Farewell! "

He mounted, and rode away in the golden August sunlight, the hounds frisking about him. The fox-brush was fastened in his hat. Thus Tristran de Léonois may have ridden a-hawking in drowned Cornwall, thus statelily and composedly, Katharine thought, gazing after him.

She went to her apartments, singing an inane song about the amorous and joyful time of spring when everything and everybody is happy, — and burst into a sudden passion of tears. There were born every day, she reflected, such hosts of women-children, who were not princesses, and therefore compelled to marry detestable kings.

"El tems amoreus plein de joie, El tems où tote riens s'esgaie,—"

Dawn found her in the orchard. She was to remember that it was a cloudy morning, and that mist-tatters trailed from the more distant trees. In the slaty twilight the garden's verdure was lusterless, the grass and foliage were uniformly somber save where dewdrops showed like beryls. Nowhere in the orchard was there absolute shadow, nowhere a vista unblurred; in the east, halfway between horizon and zenith, two belts of coppery light flared against the gray sky like embers swaddled by ashes. The birds were waking; there were occasional scurryings in tree tops, and outbursts of peevish twittering, to attest as much; and presently came a singing, less musical than that of many a bird perhaps, but far more grateful to the girl who heard it, heart in mouth. A lute accompanied the song demurely.

Sang Alain:

"O Madam Destiny, omnipotent,
Be not too obdurate to us who pray
That this our transient grant of youth be spent
In laughter as befits a holiday,
From which the evening summons us away,
From which to-morrow wakens us to strife
And toil and grief and wisdom, — and to-day
Grudge us not life!

"O Madam Destiny, omnipotent,
Why need our elders trouble us at play?
We know that very soon we shall repent
The idle follies of our holiday,
And, being old, shall be as wise as they:
But now we are not wise, and lute and fife
Plead sweetlier than axioms, — so to-day
Grudge us not life!

"O Madam Destiny, omnipotent,
You have given us youth, — and must we cast away
The cup undrained and our one coin unspent

Because our elders' beards and hearts are gray?
They have forgotten that if we delay
Death claps us on the shoulder, and with knife
Or cord or fever flouts the prayer we pray,—
'Grudge us not life!'

"Madam, recall that in the sun we play
But for an hour, then have the worm for wife,
The tomb for habitation,— and to-day
Grudge us not life!"

Candor in these matters is best. Katharine scrambled into the crotch of the apple tree. The dew pattered sharply about her, but the Princess was not in a mood to appraise discomfort.

"You came!" this harper said, transfigured; and then again, "You came!"

She breathed, "Yes."

Now for a long while they looked at each other. She found adoration in his eyes, and quailed before it; and in the man's mind not a grimy and mean incident of the past but marshaled to leer at his unworthiness: yet in old Eden's primal garden the first man and woman, meeting, knew no sweeter terror.

It was by the minstrel that a familiar earth and the grating speech of earth were earlier regained. "The affair is of the suddenest," Alain observed, and he now swung the lute behind him. He indicated no intention of touching her, though he might easily have done so as he sat there exalted by the height of his horse. "A meteor arrives with more prelude. But Love is an arbitrary lord; desiring my heart, he has seized it, and accordingly I would now brave hell to come to you, and finding you there, would esteem hell a pleasure garden. I have already made my prayer to Destiny that she concede me love. Now of God, our Father and Master, I entreat quick death if I am not to win you. No more unwaveringly do His Saints ascend to Him than I shall return to you again, even if in order to do this I have to split the world like a rotten orange."

"Madness! Oh, brave, sweet madness!" Katharine said. "You are a minstrel, and I am a king's daughter."

"Is it madness? Why, then, I think sane persons are to be commiserated. And, indeed, I spy in all this some design. Across half the earth I came to you, led by a fox. Hey, God's face!" Alain swore; "the foxes which Samson, that old sinewy captain, loosed among the corn of heathenry kindled no disputation such as this fox has set afoot. That was an affair of standing corn and olives spoilt, a bushel or so of disaster; now poised kingdoms topple on the brink of ruin. There will be martial argument shortly if you bid me come again."

"I bid you come," said Katharine; and after they had stared at each other for a long while, he rode away in silence.

It was through a dank and tear-flawed world that she stumbled conventward, while out of the east the sun came bathed in mists, a watery sun no brighter than a silver coin.

And for a month the world seemed no less dreary, but about Michaelmas the Queen-Regent sent for her. At the Hôtel de Saint-Pol matters were much the same. Katharine found her mother in foul-mouthed rage over the failure of a third attempt to poison the Dauphin of Vienne, as Queen Isabeau had previously poisoned her two elder sons: I might here trace out a certain similitude between the Valois and that dragon-spawned race which Jason very anciently slew at Colchis, since the world was never at peace so long as any two of them existed. But King Charles greeted his daughter with ampler deference, esteeming her to be the wife of Presbyter John, the tyrant of Æthiopia. However, ingenuity had just suggested card playing for King Charles' amusement, and he paid little attention nowadays to anyone save his opponent at this new game.

So the French King chirped his senile jests over the card table, while the King of England was besieging the French city of Rouen sedulously and without mercy. In late autumn an armament from Ireland joined Henry's forces. The Irish fought naked, it was said, with long knives. Katharine heard discreditable tales of these Irish, and reflected how gross are the exaggerations of rumor.

In the year of grace 1419, in January, the burgesses of Rouen, having consumed their horses, and finding frogs and rats unpalatable, yielded the town. It was the Queen-Regent who brought the news to Katharine.

"God is asleep," the Queen said; "and while He nods, the Butcher of Agincourt has stolen our good city of Rouen." She sat down and breathed heavily. "Never was any poor woman so pestered as I am! Those puddings to-day were quite uneatable, as you saw for yourself, and on Sunday the Englishman entered Rouen in great splendor, attended by his chief nobles; but the Butcher rode alone, and before him went a page carrying a fox-brush on the point of his lance. I put it to you, is that the contrivance of a sane man? Euh! euh! " Dame Isabeau squealed, on a sudden; "you are bruising me."

Katharine had gripped her by the shoulder. "The King of England, — a tall, fair man? with big teeth? a tiny wen upon his neck, — here, — and with his left cheek scarred? with blue eyes, very bright, bright as tapers? "

She poured out her questions in a torrent, and awaited the answer, seeming not to breathe at all.

"I believe so," the Queen said, "and they say, too, that he has the damned squint of old Manuel the Redeemer."

"O God! " said Katharine.

"Ay, our only hope now. And may God show him no more mercy than has this misbegotten English butcher shown us! " Dame Isabeau desired, with fervor. " The hog, having won our Normandy, is now advancing on Paris itself. He repudiated the Aragonese alliance last August; and until last August he was content with Normandy, they tell us, but now he swears to win all France. The man is a madman, and Scythian Tamburlaine was more lenient. And I do not believe that in all France there is a cook who understands his business."

She went away whimpering, and proceeded to get tipsy.

The Princess remained quite still, as Dame Isabeau had left her; you may see a hare crouch so at sight of the hounds.

Finally the girl spoke aloud. " Until last August! " Katharine said. " Until last August! Poised kingdoms topple on the brink of ruin, now that you bid me come to you again. And I bade this devil's grandson come to me, as my lover! "

She went into her oratory and began to pray.

In the midst of her invocation she wailed: " Fool, fool! How could I have thought him other than a king! "

You are to imagine her breast thus adrum with remorse and hatred of herself, the while that town by town fell before the invader like card-houses. Every rumor of defeat — and the news of some fresh defeat came daily, — was her arraignment; impotently she cowered at God's knees, knowing herself a murderess, whose infamy was still afoot, outpacing her prayers, and whose victims were battalions. Tarpeia and Pisidicé and Rahab were her sisters in iniquity; she hungered in her abasement for Judith's nobler guilt.

In May he came to her. A truce was patched up, and French and English met amicably in a great plain near Meulan. A square space was staked out and on three sides boarded in, the fourth side being the river Seine. This enclosure the Queen-Regent, Jehan of Burgundy, and Katharine entered from the French side. Simultaneously the English King appeared, accompanied by his brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, and followed by the Earl of Warwick. Katharine raised her eyes with I know not what lingering hope; but it was he, a young Zeus now, triumphant and uneager. In his helmet in place of a plume he wore a fox-brush spangled with jewels.

These six entered the tent pitched for the conference, — the hangings of blue velvet embroidered with fleurs-de-lys of gold blurred before the girl's eyes, — and there the Earl of Warwick embarked upon a sea of rhetoric. His French was indifferent, his periods were interminable, and his demands exorbitant; in brief, the King of England wanted Katharine and most of France, with a reversion at the French King's death of the entire kingdom. Meanwhile Sire Henry sat in silence, his eyes glowing.

"I have come," he said, under cover of Warwick's oratory, — "I have come again, my lady."

Katharine's gaze flickered over him. "Liar!" she said, very softly. "Has God no thunders remaining in His armory that this vile thief still goes unblasted? Would you steal love as well as kingdoms?"

His ruddy face was now white. "I love you, Katharine."

"Yes," she answered, "for I am your pretext. I can well believe, messire, that you love your pretext for theft and murder."

Neither spoke after this, and presently the Earl of Warwick having come to his peroration, the matter was adjourned till the next day. The party separated. It was not long before Katharine had informed her mother that, God willing, she would never again look upon the King of England's face uncoffined. Isabeau found her a madwoman. The girl swept opposition before her with gusts of demoniacal fury, wept, shrieked, tore at her black hair, and fell then into a sort of epileptic seizure; between rage and terror she became a horrid, frenzied beast. I do not dwell upon this, for it is not a condition in which the comeliest maid shows to advantage. But, for the Valois, insanity always lurked at the next corner, and they knew it: to save the girl's reason the Queen was forced to break off all discussion of the match. Accordingly, the Duke of Burgundy went next day to the conference alone. Duke Jehan began with "ifs," and over these flimsy barriers Henry, already fretted by Katharine's scorn, presently vaulted to a towering fury.

"Fair cousin," the King said, after some ten minutes of vehement bickering, "we wish you to know that we will have the daughter of your King, and that we will drive both him and you out of this kingdom."

The Duke answered, not without spirit, "Sire, you are pleased to say so; but before you have succeeded in ousting my lord and me from this realm, I am of the opinion that you will be very heartily tired."

At this the King turned on his heel; over his shoulder he flung: "I am tireless; also, I am agile as a fox in the pursuit of my desires. Say that to your Princess."

Then he went away in a rage.

It had seemed an approvable business to win love incognito, according to the example of many ancient emperors, but in practice he had tripped over an ugly outgrowth from the legendary custom. The girl hated him, there was no doubt about it; and it was equally certain he loved her. Particularly caustic was the reflection that a twitch of his finger would get him Katharine as his wife, for before long the Queen-Regent was again attempting secret negotiations to bring this about. Yes, he could get the girl's body by a couple of pen-strokes, and had he been older that might have contented him: as the case stood, what he wanted was to rouse the look her eyes had borne in Chartres orchard that tranquil morning, and this one could not readily secure by fiddling with seals and parchments. You see his position: this high-spirited young man now loved the Princess too utterly to take her on lip-consent, and this marriage was, now, his one possible excuse for ceasing from victorious warfare. So he blustered, and the fighting recommenced; and he slew in a despairing rage, knowing that with every triumph he became to her so much the more detestable.

Then the Vicomte de Montbrison, as you have already heard, betrayed France, and King Henry began to strip the French realm of provinces as you or I might peel the layers from an onion. By the May of the year of grace 1420 France was, and knew herself to be, not beaten but demolished. Only a fag-end of the French army lay entrenched at Troyes, where King Charles and his court awaited Henry's decision as to the morrow's action. If he chose to destroy them root and branch, he could; and they knew such mercy as was in the man to be quite untarnished by previous usage. Sire Henry drew up a small force before the city and made no overtures toward either peace or throat-cutting.

This was the posture of affairs on the evening of the Sunday after Ascension Day, when Katharine sat at cards with her father in his apartments at the Hôtel de Ville. The King was pursing his lips over an alternative play, when somebody in the courtyard below began singing.

Sang the voice:

"I can find no meaning in life,
That have weighed the world,— and it was Abundant with folly, and rife
With sorrows brittle as glass,
And with joys that flicker and pass
Like dreams through a fevered head;
And like the dripping of rain
In gardens naked and dead
Is the obdurate thin refrain
Of our youth which is presently dead.

"And she whom alone I have loved
Looks ever with loathing on me,
As one she hath seen disproved
And stained with such smirches as be
Not ever cleansed utterly;
And is loth to remember the days
When Destiny fixed her name
As the theme and the goal of my praise;
And my love engenders shame,
And I stain what I strive for and praise.

"O love, most perfect of all,
Just to have known you is well!
And it heartens me now to recall
That just to have known you is well,

And naught else is desirable
Save only to do as you willed
And to love you my whole life long; —
But this heart in me is filled
With hunger cruel and strong,
And with hunger unfulfilled.

" Fond heart, though thy hunger be
As a flame that wanders unstilled,
There is none more perfect than she! "

Malise now came into the room, and, without speaking, laid a fox-brush before the Princess.

Katharine twirled it in her hand, staring at the card-littered table. " So you are in his pay, Malise? I am sorry. But you know that your employer is master here. Who am I to forbid him entrance? "

The girl went away silently, abashed, and the Princess sat quite still, tapping the brush against the table.

" They do not want me to sign another treaty, do they? " her father asked timidly. " It appears to me they are always signing treaties, and I cannot see that any good comes of it. And I would have won the last game, Katharine, if Malise had not interrupted us. You know I would have won."

" Yes, Father, you would have won. Oh, he must not see you! " Katharine said then, with a great tide of love mounting in her breast, the love that draws a mother fiercely to shield her backward boy. "Father, will you not go into your chamber? I have a new book for you, Father, — all pictures, dear. Come, let us look at Mélusine beguiling Raymondin at the fairy fountain, and at Mélusine strangling her child, and at Mélusine flying out of the castle window, with a great fish's tail —"

She was thus coaxing him when Sire Henry appeared in the doorway.

"But I do not wish to look at pictures," Charles said, peevishly; "I wish to play cards. You are an ungrateful daughter, Katharine. You are never willing to amuse me."

He sat down with a whimper, and began to pluck at his gray and dribbling lips.

Katharine had moved a little toward the door. Her face was white.

"Now welcome, sire!" she said. "Welcome, O great conqueror, who in your hour of triumph can find no nobler recreation than to shame a maid with her past folly! It was valorously done, sire. See, Father: here is the King of England come to observe how low we sit that yesterday were lords of France."

"The King of England!" echoed Charles, and he rose now to his feet. "I thought we were at war with him. But my memory is treacherous. You perceive, brother of England, I am planning a new mouse-trap, and my mind is somewhat pre-empted. I recall now that you are in treaty for my daughter's hand. Katharine is a good girl, a fine upstanding girl, but I suppose — " He paused, as if to regard and hear some invisible counsellor, and then briskly resumed: " Yes, I suppose policy demands that she should marry you. We trammeled kings can never go free of policy, — ey, my compère of England? No; it was through policy that I married her mother; and we have been unhappy persons, Isabeau and I. A word in your ear, son-in-law: Madame Isabeau's soul formerly inhabited a sow, as Pythagoras teaches, and when our Saviour cast it out at Gadara, the influence of the moon drew it hither."

Henry did not say anything. Steadily his calm blue eyes appraised Dame Katharine. And King Charles went on, very knowingly:

" Oho, these Latinists cannot hoodwink me, you observe, though by ordinary it chimes with my humor to appear content. Policy again, son-in-law: for once roused, I am terrible. To-day in the great hall window, under the bleeding feet of Lazarus, I slew ten flies, — very black they were, the black shriveled souls of parricides, — and afterward I wept for it. I often weep; the Mediterranean hath its sources in my eyes, for my daughter cheats at cards. Cheats, sir! — and I her father! "

The incessant peering, the stealthy cunning with which Charles whispered this, and the confidence with which he clung to his destroyer's hand, gave now to this insane gray King the air of a conspiring child.

"Come, Father!" Katharine said. "Come away to bed, dear!"

"Hideous basilisk!" he spat at her; "dare you rebel against me? Am I not King of France, and is it not blasphemy for a king of France to be mocked? Frail moths that flutter about my splendor," he shrieked, in an unheralded frenzy, "beware of me, beware! for I am omnipotent! I am King of France, Heaven's regent. At my command the winds go about the earth, and nightly the stars are kindled for my recreation. Perhaps I am mightier than God, but I do not remember now. The reason is written down and lies somewhere under a bench. Now I sail for England. Eia! eia! I go to ravage England, terrible and merciless. But I must have my mouse-traps, Goodman Devil, for in England the cats of the middle-sea wait unfed."

He went out of the room, giggling, and in the corridor began to sing:

> I go to seek the Evangelist,
> For here all persons cheat and lie . . ."

All this while Henry remained immovable, his eyes fixed upon Katharine. Thus (she meditated) he stood among Frenchmen; he was the boulder, and they the waters that babbled and fretted about him. She turned and met his gaze squarely. She noted now, for the first time, how oddly his left eyebrow drooped.

Katharine said: "And that is the king whom you have conquered! Is it not a notable conquest to overcome so wise a king? to pilfer renown from an idiot? There are cutthroats in Troyes, rogues doubly damned, who would scorn the action. Now shall I fetch my mother, sire? the commander of that great army which you overcame? As the hour is late, she is by this time tipsy, but she will come. Or perhaps she is with some paid lover, but if this conqueror, this second Alexander, wills it she will come. O God!" the girl wailed, on a sudden; "O just and all-seeing God! are not we of Valois so contemptible that in conquering us it is the victor who is shamed?"

"Flower of the marsh!" he said, and his voice pulsed with tender cadences, — "flower of the marsh! it is not the King of England who now comes to you, but Alain the harper. God has led me hither by the hand to punish the sins of this realm, and to reign in it like a true king. I will presently cast out the Valois from the throne they have defiled, as Darius cast out Belshazzar, for such is the desire and the intent of God. But to you returns once more Alain the harper, not as a conqueror but as a suppliant, — that rather obstinate Alain who has loved you wholeheartedly these two years past, and who now kneels before you entreating grace."

Katharine looked down into his countenance, for to his speech he had fitted action. Suddenly, and for the first time, she understood that he believed France to be his by Divine favor and Heaven's peculiar intervention. She was touched by the naïveté of his Biblical reference to Darius and Belshazzar. Yes, he was rather stupid, this huge, handsome, squinting boy; and as she comprehended this fact, her hand went to the all-conqueror's shoulder, and rested there for an instant, half-maternally.

"It is nobly done, sire. But I understand. You must marry me in order to uphold your claim to France. You sell, and I with my body purchase, peace for this ruined land. There is no need of a lover's posture when hucksters meet."

"So changed!" he said, and he was silent for an interval, still kneeling. Then he began: "You force me to point out that I do not need any pretext for holding France. France lies before me prostrate. By God's singular grace I reign in this fair kingdom, mine by right of conquest, and an alliance with the house of Valois will neither make nor mar me." She was unable to deny this, unpalatable as was the fact. "But I love you, and therefore as man woos woman I sue to you. Do you not understand that there can be between us no question of expediency? Katharine, in Chartres orchard there met a man and a maid we know of; now in Troyes they meet again, — not as princess and king, but as man and maid, the wooer and the wooed. Once I touched your heart, I think.

And now in all the world there is one thing I covet — to gain for the poor king some portion of that love you would have squandered on the harper."

His hand closed upon her hand.

At his touch the girl's composure vanished. "My lord, you woo too timidly for one who comes with many loud-voiced advocates. I am daughter to the King of France, and next to my soul's salvation I esteem the welfare of France. Can I, then, fail to love the King of England, who chooses the blood of my countrymen as a judicious garb to come a-wooing in? How, sire, can I deny you true affection, since you have ravaged my native land, since you have besmirched the name I bear, since yonder afield every wound in my dead and yet unburied Frenchmen is to me a mouth which shrieks your infamy? "

He rose. "And yet, for all that, you love me."

She could not at the first effort find words with which to answer him, but presently she said, quite simply, "To see you lying in your coffin I would willingly give up my hope of heaven, for heaven can afford no sight more desirable."

"You loved Alain."

"I loved the husk of a man. You can never comprehend how utterly I loved him."

The King replied: "You are stubborn. That is a fault in a wife. I shall have trouble with you. Meanwhile, this notion of yours is plainly a mistaken notion. That you love me is indisputable, and this I propose to demonstrate. You will observe that I am wholly unarmed except for this dagger, which I now throw out of the window, — " with the word it jangled in the courtyard below. " I am in Troyes alone among some thousand Frenchmen, any one of whom would willingly give his life for the privilege of taking mine. You have but to sound the gong beside you, and in a few moments I shall be a dead man. Strike, then! for with me dies the English power in France. Strike, Katharine! if you see in me but the King of England."

She stayed rigid; and — as the girl well knew, — her terror now was visible. She said only:

" You came alone! You dared! "

He answered, with a wonderful smile, " Proud spirit! how else might I conquer you? "

" You have not conquered! "

Katharine had lifted the bâton from beside the gong. She held this bâton poised, ready to strike eagerly. The Eternal Father, in His own miraculous and ever-merciful way, had granted her prayer, — to save France, by very promptly killing this big and hateful Englishman. Now the past and the ignominy of the past might be merged in Judith's nobler guilt. But I must tell you that in the supreme hour, with Destiny at her beck, her main desire was to slap the man for his childishness. He had no right thus to besot himself with desire of any woman. This dejection at her feet of his high destiny awed her, and pricked her, too, with her inability to understand him. Angrily she flung away the bâton.

"Go! ah, go!" she cried, like one strangling. "There has been enough of bloodshed, and I must spare you, loathing you as I do, for I cannot with my own hand murder you."

But the King was a kindly tyrant, crushing independence from his associates as lesser folk squeeze water from a sponge. "I cannot go thus. Do you acknowledge me to be Alain, the man you love, or else strike upon that gong!"

"You are cruel!" she wailed, in her torture.

"Yes, I am cruel."

Katharine raised straining arms above her head in a hard gesture of despair. "You have conquered. You know that I love you. Oh, if I could find words to voice my shame, to shriek it in your face, I could better endure it! For I love you. With all my body and heart and soul I love you. Mine is the agony, for I love you! and presently I shall stand quite still and see little Frenchmen scramble about you as hounds leap upon a stag, and afterward kill you. And after that I shall live! I preserve France, but after I have slain you, O my dearest, I must live. Mine is the agony, mine is the enduring agony." She stayed motionless for an interval. "God, God! let me not fail!" Katharine breathed; and then: "O fair sweet friend, I am about to commit a vile action, but it is for the sake of the France that I love next to God. As Judith gave her body to Holofernes, I crucify my heart for the preservation of France."

Very calmly she struck upon the gong.

If she could have found any reproach in his eyes during the ensuing silence, she could have borne it; but there was only a great fondness and some pitying. Yet he smiled, too, like one who knew the upshot of this matter.

A man-at-arms came into the room.

"Germain—" said Katharine, and then again, "Germain—" She gave a swallowing motion and was silent. When she spoke it was with crisp distinctness. "Germain, fetch a harp. Messire Alain here is about to play for me."

At the man's departure she said: "I am well proven to be only a Valois. Our bodies may not withstand you. Your strength is greater than is the strength of our weakling bodies. Yet, need you have dragged my soul, too, in the dust? God heard my prayer, and you have forced me to deny His favor, as Peter denied Christ: you have forced me to betray that which I ought to have served loyally. My dear, be very kind to me, for I come to you naked of honor." She fell at the King's feet, embracing his knees. "My master, be very kind to me, for there remains only your love."

He raised her to his breast. "Love is enough," he said.

She was conscious, as he held her thus, of the chain mail under his jerkin. He had come armed; he had his soldiers no doubt in the corridor; and this tall and fair-haired and slightly squinting stranger had tricked her, it might be from the first. But that did not matter now.

"Love is enough," she told her master docilely.

Next day the English entered Troyes and in the cathedral church these two were betrothed. Sire Henry, whom all persons now esteemed the most lucky and the least scrupulous rogue of his times, was upon that day magnificent in a curious suit of burnished armor: but in place of his helmet-plume he wore a fox-brush ornamented with jewels, which unusual ornament afforded great matter of remark among the busybodies of both armies.

THE END OF THE TENTH NOVEL

THE EPILOGUE

"Et je fais sçavoir à tous lecteurs de ce Livret que les choses que je dis avoir vues et sues sont enregistrés icy, afin que vous pouviez les regarder selon vostre bon sens, s'il vous plaist."

Here is appended the Epilogue that Messire Nicolas de Caen affixed to the book which he had made according to the best of his ability; and which (in consequence) he dared not appraise.

THE EPILOGUE

À Son Livret

INTREPIDLY depart, my little book, into the presence of that most illustrious lady who bade me compile you! Bow down before her judgment! And if her sentence be that of a fiery death, I counsel you not to grieve at what cannot be avoided.

But, if, by any miracle, that glorious, strong fortress of the weak consider it advisable that you remain unburned, pass thence, my little book, to every man who may desire to purchase you, and live out your little hour among these charitable persons; and at your appointed season perish and be forgotten. Thus may you share your betters' fate, and be at one with those famed comedies of Greek Menander and all the poignant songs of Sappho. Et quid Pandoniæ — thus, little book, I charge you to poultice your more-merited oblivion, — quid Pandoniæ restat nisi nomen Athenæ?

Yet even in your brief existence you may chance to meet with those who will affirm that the stories you tell are not true, and that you narrate as facts affairs which are merely fables. To these you will reply that I, your maker, was in my youth the unworthy servant of the most high and noble lady, Dame Jehane, and that in this period, at and about her house of Havering-Bower, I conversed in my own person with Dame Katharine, then happily remarried to a private gentleman of Wales; and so obtained the matter of the ninth story and of the tenth authentically. You will say, also, that Messire de Montbrison afforded me the main matter of the sixth and seventh stories, and many of the songs which this book contains; and that, moreover, I once journeyed to Caer Idion and talked for some two hours with Master Richard Holland (whom I found a very old and garrulous and cheery person), and got of him the matter of the eighth tale in this dizain, together with much information as concerns the sixth and the seventh tales. And you will add that the matter of the fourth and fifth tales was related to me by my most illustrious mistress, Madame Isabella of Portugal, who had this information from her mother, a veracious and immaculate lady that was in youth Dame Philippa's most dear associate. For the rest, you must admit, unwillingly, the first three stories in this book to be a thought less solidly confirmed; although (as you will say) even in these histories I have not ever deviated from what was now and again narrated to me by the aforementioned persons, and I have always endeavored honestly to piece together that which they told me.

I have pieced together these tales about the women who intermarried, not very enviably, with the demon-tainted blood of Edward Longshanks, because it seems to me that these tales, whensoever they are rightly considered, compose the initial portion of a troubling history. Whether (as some declare) the taint came from Manuel of Poictesme, or whether (as yet others say) this poison was inherited from the demon wife whom Foulques Plantagenet fetched out of hell, the blood in these men was not all human. These men might not tread equally with human beings: their wives suffered therefor, just as they that had inherited this blood suffered therefor, and all England suffered therefor, along with several other kingdoms to boot. These men were cankered with an irreligious desire to have the affairs of this mortal world proceeding more equably with frail human reason. They served the fair code of chivalry and of domnei with great difficulty. And the upshot of their rebelliousness I have narrated elsewhere, in the book called and entitled The Red Cuckold, which composes the final portion of this history, and which tells of the last spilling and of the extinction of this demon-tainted blood.

Also, my little book, you will encounter more malignant people who will jeer at you, and will say that you and I have cheated them of your purchase-money. To these you will reply, with Plutarch, Non mi aurum posco, nec mi pretium. Secondly, you will say that, of necessity, the tailor cuts the coat according to his cloth; and that he cannot undertake to robe an Ephialtes or a towering Orion suitably when the resources of his shop amount to only a few yards of cambric. Indeed, had I the power to make you better, my little book, I would have exercised that power to the utmost. A good conscience is a continual feast, and I summon high Heaven to be my witness that had I been Homer you had awed the world, another Iliad. I lament your inability to posture as a large masterpiece as heartily as does any person living; yet Heaven willed it; and it is in consequence to Heaven that these aforementioned cavilers should rightfully complain.

So to such impious people do you make no answer at all, unless, indeed, you should elect to answer them by repetition of this song which I now make for you, my little book, at your departure from me. And the song runs in this fashion:

Depart, depart, my book! and live and die
Dependent on the idle fantasy
Of men who cannot view you, quite, as I.

For I am fond, and willingly mistake
My book to be the book I meant to make,
And may not judge you, for that phantom's sake.

Yet pardon me if I have wrought too ill
In making you, that never spared the will
To shape you perfectly, and lacked the skill.

THE EPILOGUE

Ah, had I but the power, my book, then I
Had wrought in you some wizardry so high
That no man but had listened . . .

They pass by,
And shrug — as we, who know that unto us
It has been granted never to fare thus,
And never to be strong and glorious.

Is it denied me to perpetuate
What so much loving labor did create? —
I hear Oblivion tap upon the gate,
And acquiesce, not all disconsolate.

For I have got such recompense
Of that high-hearted excellence
Which the contented craftsman knows,
Alone, that to loved labor goes,
And daily does the work he chose,
And counts all else impertinence!
